A variety of factors have been suggested as contributing to the economic growth of students, including (1) more lottery winners between the ages of 18 and 22, (2) a 37% increase on earnings from bottle and can returns, (3) more students doubling earnings in the lightning round of game shows, and (4) the Citibank Classic Visa* card. It's this last one, however, that affects most students. ¶ The Citibank Classic Visa card offers immediate savings to student cardmembers. You can save up to 26% on long distance calls versus AT&T with the free Citibank Calling Service™ from MCI.[1] And you can capitalize on a $20 Airfare Discount for domestic flights.[2] Savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, magazines and music also abound. Maximize these savings with a low variable interest rate of 15.4%[3] and no annual fee, and you can significantly improve your personal bottom line (especially if one's net income tends to be pretty gross). Put another way, one might even have enough savings to reinvest in a CD or two (the musical kind, of course). ¶ On the way to the record store, or any store for that matter, take stock of the 3 services concerned with purchases made on the Citibank Classic card. Citibank Price Protection assures one of the best prices. See the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150.[4] To protect these investments, Buyers Security™ can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft (ordinarily causes for Great Depressions) for 90 days from the date of purchase.[4] And Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ can extend the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.[5] ¶ But perhaps the features which offer the best protection are your eyes, your nose, your mouth, etc.—all featured on The Photocard, the credit card with your photo on it. Carrying it can help prevent fraud or any hostile takeover of your card. (Insiders speculate that it makes quite a good student ID, too.) Even if one's card is stolen, or perhaps lost, The Lost Wallet™ Service can replace your card usually within 24 hours. ¶ So never panic. As we all know, panic, such as in the Great Panics of 1837, 1857, and 1929, can cause a downswing in a market. But with 24-hour Customer Service, there's no reason for it. A question about your account is only an 800 number away. (Panic of the sort experienced the night before Finals is something else again.) ¶ Needless to say, building a credit history with the support of such services can only be a boost. You're investing in futures—that future house, that future car, etc. And knowing the Citibank Classic Visa card is there in your wallet should presently give you a sense of security, rare in today's—how shall we say?—fickle market. ¶ To apply, call. Students don't need a job or a cosigner. And call if you'd simply like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. Here's the number: 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19. ¶ The Law of Student Supply and Demand states, "If a credit card satisfies more of a student's unlimited wants and needs, while reducing the Risk Factor in respect to limited and often scarce resources—with the greatest supply of services and savings possible—then students will demand said credit card." So, demand away—call.

No known picture of Washington smiling exists. Economists believe Washington was unhappy because he felt he could have received a better deal on war supplies. If he used a Citibank Classic Visa card, he would have been assured of getting the best price and probably would have been happier. (Artist rendering of how he would have appeared on the dollar.)

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Monarch Notes® Version:
The Citibank Classic Visa card will be there for you with special student discounts, no fee, and a low rate...so your own economy will be more like a boom than a bust. Call 1-800-CITIBANK, ext. 19.

[1]Savings claim is based on a 10-minute night/weekend call in the 1,911 to 3,000 mileage band using MCI's Card Compatibility rates vs. AT&T's standard calling card rates, effective 4/93. Citibank Calling Service long distance usage cannot be applied to obtain benefits under any other MCI partner program or offer, including travel award programs. Offer expires 6/30/94. Minimum ticket purchase price is $300. Rebates are for Citibank student cardmembers on tickets issued by ISE Flights only. [2]The Annual Percentage Rate for purchases is 15.4% as of 6/93 and may vary quarterly. The Annual Percentage Rate for cash advances is 19.8%. If a finance charge is imposed, the minimum is 50 cents. Nirvana returns to womb of grunge

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

What's a poor band to do after selling millions upon millions of albums, gaining worldwide superstardom and influencing an entire wave of pop culture? Change.

Nevermind that stint of flawless production and calculated promotion which catapulted Nirvana to the heights of musical success. Seattle's favorite grungy sons have taken a half-step back with the release of In Utero. This is not a bad idea.

Instead of thrusting forth another batch of slick and polished tunes, Kurt Cobain and Co. have produced a scant 40 minutes of music more reminiscent of scruffier older works like Bleach and last year's collection of B-sides entitled Incesticide. The resulting smoothed over abrasion makes for a good listen. Quick sports analogy — it's kind of like Lenny Dykstra: scruffy, tough and fast but caught in a slump every now and then.

The pushing of "Heart-Shaped Box" and "Rape Me" as the first singles off the album is questionable. These are not the best tracks. Admittedly, they do indeed rawk (to abuse a currently hip alternative term). I could go on to talk about the cynical attitude of "Rape Me," how it jokingly uses the riff from the mega-anthem "Smells Like Teen Spirit" and how it represents Nirvana's admirable fight against corporate rock, but it's not worth getting into.

Some important stuff happens on In Utero. For one, there is the aforementioned eloquent offensive against corporatism and Cobain is the perfect once-corrupted, sandpaper throated spokesman. His rasp and spew are ugly and brutal. A handful of the tunes tackle the industry's fickle prostituting of any new apparent fad.

The most powerful of such tunes is "Frances Farmer will Have her Revenge on Seattle." Never has a more powerful testimony been given by a more fitting spokesman. "It's so relieving to know that you're leaving as soon as you get paid," Cobain sneers. It's (probably) so hard for a multi-millionare to spit forth such language against the industry which elevated him. But it's equally hard to label Nirvana as sellouts. If anything, they're victims.

Remnants of the Nevermind era are represented in "Dumb." Driving and, of course, sardonic, it's a little piece of scrap metal which though featuring some priceless lyrics, just doesn't belong.

The new/old Nirvana is best seen on tunes like "Radio Friendly Unit Shifter," which happily incorporates good production thanks to Steve Albini: cynicism, distortion and, joy of joys, feedback. This is the direction the band should be heading — a half-step back, a full-step forward.

But just when you mutter how indifferent you are about the trio's new offering, — success! "All Apologies" is the last and best track. It is indeed an apology, apparently from Cobain to his masses. "What else should I be/All apologies." Apology accepted Kurt, though you have nothing to be sorry about. "All Apologies" peaks and dives, all the while thriving on Cobain's raspy drama, bassist Chris Novoselic's resounding twang and drummer Dave Grohl's powerful foundation.

If Nirvana had never become famous, "Teen Spirit" would still be a catchy tune, Novoselic would still look cool as dung with that knee high bass stance and Cobain would still have married Courtney Love. The only difference is In Utero would not be such a big deal and it would sound more impressive. B-

New parody radio show

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

Amherst, 1994: The privatization of the University of Massachusetts is complete. Newly re-christened as "Cravington U," the once-proud institution has fallen into the hands of the rich, randy and rapacious Cravington clan. The emergence of this new regime creates problems for a bewildered freshman class, while the eponymous tribe must grapple with the re-emergence of their lost heiress, in the unlikely form of a stranger from Springfield.

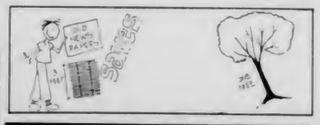
If it sounds like a soap opera, there is good reason. This off-kilter glance into tomorrow is actually the setting for Granny Applethorpe's Fluid Hour of Power, a parody of radio melodramas which kicks off this Saturday at the witching hour on WMUA radio. The Hour of Power is sponsored by the odd and unsettling Granny Applethorpe Corporation, manufacturers of a magic elixir (advertisements describe it as a "cure-all, household cleaner and soft drink") which not only tastes great, but also solves every problem which the Cravingtons and friends get themselves tangled in.

This Granny is the brainchild of four UMass students, Brad Rosman, Kip Manley, Peter Fernandez and Barry "Cast of Thousands" Deutsch, and represents a daring venture on the part of WMUA. Although the UMass station has played host to radio theatre in the past, mostly by sponsoring one-time-only specials, this is the first time it has attempted to produce a regular series. New installments of Granny will be produced each week, with running times that vary from "around an hour" to "movie length."

This weekend's debut episode introduces the mysterious figure of Lloyd Galliard, a simpleton from Springfield, Ohio, who may or may not be the long-lost Tabitha Cravington. While experts speculate that Galliard has undergone a sex change operation, massive cosmetic surgery and a bout of amnesia, Tabitha's former lover launches a secret scheme to lead Galliard into a second gender switch.

In addition to these adventures, the show will also feature music by local bands such as Electric Noodle Factory, and segments with titles like "Ivy's Story Corner" and "Wisdom from the Tentacles of Jake Squid."

The Fluid Hour's countless characters will be performed by a cast of 12 actors, including the Theatre Guild's Elise Schild and Noises Off scene-stealer Cutter Garcia. Veteran student composer Peter (Cloud Nine) Fernandez will serve as the musical director.



Co-writer and co-producer Barry Deutsch promises that the Hour of Power should "offend everyone by the eighth episode," but feels that listeners will enjoy the nonsensical, somewhat bewildering saga of Cravington U. He is also quick to defend the integrity of "Granny Applethorpe's Fluid," pointing out that no cheap, foreign grandmothers are used in its production. "Every bottle," he says, "is drained from 100% Pure American Grandmothers."

Granny Applethorpe's Fluid Hour of Power will premiere Saturday Oct. 2, midnight, on WMUA 91.1 FM.

'Hey Jealousy'

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are in a better position to assess a future situation today. Postpone signing a legal document. A relationship is sinking fast. Talk things over before it's too late.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your love life improves. Delightful new friends enter your life when you expand your social activities. Follow your intuition when cementing a business deal.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Do not let others persuade you to dip into your financial reserves. "Doing your own thing" now could boomerang. Putting loved ones' needs ahead of your own will haunt domestic harmony.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Partnership ventures are starred today. Your earnings increase when you organize your financial affairs along new lines. Heed that strong inner voice. Cut negative ties.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): VIPs see the value of your methods. Look forward to taking on a large and important project. Physical fitness activity has you feeling good about yourself.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A great day to approach higher-ups. You can afford to take the lead. Letters and telephone calls help promote a pet project. Keep your private life and business affairs completely separate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Look out for someone who challenges your expertise or authority. You need to stay calm. Limit your personal spending. Once you get better organized things will go more smoothly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A reorganization works to your advantage. Careful money management will increase your cash flow. Major changes at your workplace make you feel more confident about the future.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A forgiving attitude will help you and your partner draw closer together. Good luck accompanies you when you travel.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): In the office or in the field, the numbers begin to add up now. Think big and you will succeed beyond your wildest expectations. You should have fun tonight, but be careful!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Words said, read or written this morning will step up career progress. You could unearth a real bargain. Time may be of the essence — act immediately. Romance may be hiding in the wings.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A good day for paying what you owe, collecting what is due you and making plans for the future. A loving, nurturing attitude will enhance a close relationship. Ask an important question.

Univeristy of Massachusetss field hockey gears up for weekend action against the Lady Monarchs of Old Dominion

this was the same Mallen who last spring had been given the job of resurrecting Massachusetts hockey. She affirmed that Joe was her husband.

"That's great," the mechanic said. "I love hockey, but only big time hockey."

"What do you mean by big time hockey?" Mrs. Mallen asked.

"You know, Maine, Boston University, BC. Hockey East teams."

Image and perception.

Massachusetts is a Hockey East team.

So Mallen is back hitting the streets letting everyone know. UMass is big time hockey. If you have an ear, he'll fill it. Have a newspaper, he wants to be in it. Run a radio show, he'll be your guest.

And if you listen, it won't take a minute before you realize Joe Mallen is big time and his Minutemen will be sure to follow.

The kid from St. Mark's in Dorchester was born for this job. He played goalie at Christopher Columbus then walked on at Boston University. Walked on? That's right, this guy doesn't understand the word "no." He later transferred to Michigan State where he played between the pipes.

He head coached at UMass-Boston for six years and has spent seven as an assistant at Hockey East power Boston College.

"My whole life I've dreamed of coaching Division I," Mallen said. "And now its here."

But Mallen's job is daunting. Start a team from scratch, with no fan base and in your second season play in the finest college hockey league in the nation. Road trips to Orono can be ugly, no matter who you are. Try doing it with all freshmen and sophomores. Gulp.

"Nothing scares me about Hockey East," Mallen said. "I've been in this league for seven years, I know what it takes to win here. We could take some on the chin in the next few years but this team will keep going."

And the way Mallen has this program pointed, UMass could be delivering some counter punches in the next few seasons. Bet on it.

Mallen has his hands on five of the top high school players in hockey rich eastern Massachusetts. He has been combing his old neighborhood, stopping in at Catholic Memorial, Arlington High, Matignon, B.C. High and Belmont Hill. This is his turf and he is staking his claim.

"Our top priority is going after every blue-chip player in Massachusetts," Mallen said. "Five top kids have narrowed their schools down to four places: BU, BC, Maine and UMass."

Big time hockey, to say the least

"What we need is to have that one big kid give us a chance," he said. "When he breaks down the wall, the recruits will flow in. I don't know if that will be this year or next, but it will happen."

But do not think the players Mallen has right now will not make waves this year. He is already talking about a possible upset in the season opener at Merrimack and he speaks highly of goaltenders David Kilduff and Rich Moriarty and a few of his forwards. UMass will play a wide open style, sure to bring in the fans.

"Right now I'm most worried about filling the place," Mallen said. "I don't know what the students here think about our program. Even if they know we are Division I."

Image and perception.

"We need a wild hockey crowd," Mallen said. "The kind they get at Harvard or RPI. The kind which intimidate opposing teams.

Harvard, despite the blue bloods, BMWs and tilted up noses have some serious fans. It would be embarrassing for UMass, a more Bruins-like, blue collar school to be outdone by the Crimson kids. The crowds will come.

"I sure hope so," Mallen said. "We need that to make it. Our first exhibition is October 17 on a Sunday afternoon against Penn State. On the 30th, we open with Villanova (Gov. Weld will be there). That's when we need to start."

Image and perception.

collegiate career as a Lady Monarch and said she would like to beat her former team.

"Everyone feels that they're so good. If we were to beat them, it would say that we're good, because we're not really getting any respect right now," said Barclay.

"We're the underdogs. We've got nothing to lose and we're going to play like we've got nothing to lose," said junior Kyri Sparks. "This is the team that is going to do it. It's the team. There's no one person that stands out so we have to do it all together."

"Hey, I'm an optimist. We have a week off and two to prepare for the Cardinals. I think we'll be a different team in two weeks," Reiss said. Well I'm a pessimist.

With the first pick in the NFL draft, New England selects . . .

The team that victimized Parcells last week takes on Philadelphia this week in a clash of two clubs that seem to be on the way up.

You don't rush seven men at Drew Bledsoe in the third quarter up 35-0. I hope Vincent Brown and company take it easy on New York up in Foxboro later in the year, but I would expect retaliation in a big way. What goes around comes around, Coslet.

As for a prediction between the Eagles and the Jets, Randall Cunningham is the barometer of success for the Cheesesteaks, and if he isn't pressured early into making mistakes, it will be tough for New York to stop him from winning the game.

When Philly wins, they will be 4-0 and on top of the NFC East. However, the match-up with the Jets could be the high point of their season. Philadelphia 24, New York Jets 23.

New Orleans is undefeated, and I'll admit that they only have to win one more game to exceed the win total that I predicted before the season began. I am truly amazed that the Saints beat the 49ers last week, but with the leg of Morten, anything is possible.

The Rams are similar to Philly in that they live or die with the arm of their QB. Jim Everett is long overdue. LA Rams 23, New Orleans 10.

The Cowboys entertain Green Bay on Sunday in Emmitt Smith's homecoming. The Pack has a chance.

Yeah, forgeddaboutit. Troy Aikman was nearly perfect against Phoenix, and that was without Emmitt through two quarters. Dallas will not lose a game for the rest of the year now that the offense is in place.

Sorry, Reggie, but you shouldn't have lost to the Vikes. Make it two in a row. Dallas 28, Green Bay 13.

Did you see that?

- Coaching vacancies in Atlanta and Houston.
- You will very soon.
- That Scott's Shots guy and his pick of the Dolphins last week. Wow, I didn't think of picking the Fish.

Minutemen to Duke it out with James Madison

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team returns to the friendly confines of McGuirk Stadium as it hosts James Madison University tomorrow at 1 p.m.

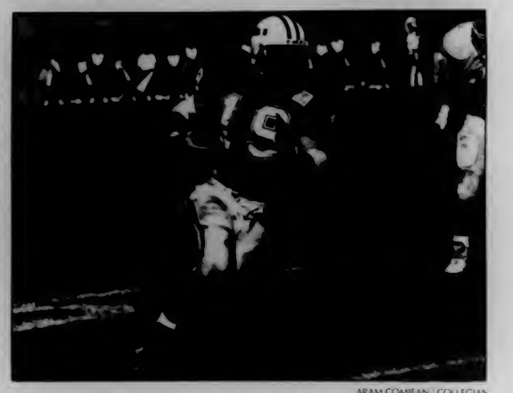
The last two weekends have not been as friendly to the Minutemen as they dropped their first two league games, losing to Maine, 17-13 and to Boston University, 28-9.

The Minutemen (0-2 in Yankee Conference play, 1-2 overall) will play in Amherst for the first time since their season opener when they crushed Holy Cross 37-7.

"When you're going out, you're less comfortable in someone else's home than if you are entertaining people in your own home," said UMass offensive coordinator Doug Berry. "It's the same way people with football. You are more comfortable being at home."

The Dukes of James Madison travel to Amherst sporting a high-powered offense. Leading the JMU attack will be quarterback Mike Cawley and wide receiver David McLeod.

Cawley, a sophomore transfer from Syracuse, was explosive in his first two games as a Duke, passing for 313 yards against Connecticut and 227 yards against Jacksonville State last Saturday.



McLeod, an All-American candidate, had four catches for 137 yards against Jacksonville State, including a 36-yard touchdown. The TD tied a school record for most touchdowns in a career at JMU with 16. The former JMU player he is tied with? Former Washington Redskins and current Phoenix Cardinals Gary Clark.

The Minuteman offense, third in the Yankee Conference in total offense, were the victims of poor field position last week at BU as mistakes were made by the kicking teams.

"We need a win, and we need one badly," said UMass head coach Mike Hodges. "We've been focusing on taking care of our own problems."

"We'll be ready to play. These guys are upset over the fact that we have two losses. They practiced extremely hard (this week) and I expect them to play a really good football game on Saturday."

GAME NOTES: Tomorrow's game is special for two reasons — it is Parents Weekend as well as Band Day . . . the game can be heard live on WMUA 91.1 FM and WTTT 1440.

Clash for field hockey honors

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Three straight NCAA field hockey championships, a No. 2 national ranking and one of the strongest winning traditions in collegiate athletics is what Old Dominion brings to the University of Massachusetts tomorrow for the long awaited matchup between the Lady Monarchs and the No. 6 Minutewomen.

"We will be ready," said UMass head coach Pam Hixon. "Whenever you play the best, it certainly adds life to the game. It's a game that I don't worry about my team being ready or up to play for."

ODU fields a very talented line up throughout. Junior goaltender Kim Decker, a member of the United States national team, enters tomorrow's contest with an impressive 1.04 goals against average.

"She is excellent," said Hixon. "She will definitely present a test to our forwards."

Freshman forward Katja Neumann, a native of Hamburg, Germany, has emerged as an offensive threat, putting up some impressive numbers (7 goals, 4 assists) in her first collegiate season.

"It's a free game, because nobody expects you to win," Hixon said. "We're not going to hold anything back, because we have nothing to lose and have everything to gain."

Old Dominion lost its first game in almost three years last weekend to top ranked Penn State followed by a tie with No. 3 North Carolina. They will be looking to rebound this weekend.

"I think we can be better," said ODU head coach Beth Anders. "We've been a bit tentative so far."

"They appear to have a little chink in their armor," said Hixon. "I think that we can certainly be in the ball game, with a lot of hustle and a couple of good breaks here and there, we have every chance of being right there and getting the result that we want."

"UMass is an excellent team," said Anders. "I'm sure they'll be well prepared for us. We just have to go out and play our game."

There will be a personal score to settle for Minutewoman senior Tracy Barclay. She started her

Dallas-Packers headline week's top match-ups

"If I was traded to Buffalo tomorrow, I would retire from football." — Brian Cox.

Overall record: 5-3.

How about NBC showing Mr. Cox's salute to the fans in Orchard Park? In my opinion, the fans from Buffalo deserve it. Hey, it's too damn cold to take taunting from the overpaid, underachieving Bills and their fans. The chicken wings are probably the only thing worth going to that city for in the first place. Well, that and the bars don't close until 4 a.m. I hope they don't win another game.

Art Stapleton's PIGSKIN PICKS

[The preceding was this columnist's biased and idiotic view of Buffalo, mainly because I was screwed this summer by the World University Games, which were very profitable I might add.]

Anyway, last season I made the mistake of not picking the Dolphins when they went into the Park and blew the Bills out of the water. I wasn't about to make the same mistake twice. Told ya' so.

• San Francisco is OVERRATED. Where are you Joe when they need you?

Then again, he probably couldn't have blocked Morten Anderson's game-winning field goal. But Niner fans wanted Steve Young to. It is time to move on, folks. Enough said.

• I guess the Patriots now have to wait two more weeks for a win. Mike "Pee-Wee" Reiss, one of my Picks correspondents, had some more wit and wisdom regarding the fading Pats.

Women gear up for top-flight tourney

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Another weekend brings another road trip to face top ten competition for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

Last weekend, Massachusetts (6-1-1), ranked No. 10 nationally, took in the San Francisco area sunshine while splitting two contests (2-1 victory of St. Mary's, 1-0, overtime loss to No. 5 Santa Clara).

This weekend the Minutewomen head to historic Williamsburg, Va. where William & Mary (5-1-1), ranked No. 7 nationally, will host a competitive tournament.

UMass will face Providence at 2 p.m. on Saturday and the Tribe at noon on Sunday. Duke, ranked No. 6 nationally, will also be in the tournament.

"This will a big test for us," Rudy said. "William & Mary is very tough and we need to see how we'll rebound from the Santa Clara loss. Providence is also a difficult to play team."

The Lady Friars defeated UMass 3-1 last season in a major upset.

"We remember that loss," Rudy said. "We can not afford to walk through that game. We learned that last season. We have to play to win."

But William & Mary will be the featured match-up. The Tribe has lost only to No. 3 Notre Dame and tied No. 11 George Mason. They are led by sophomore, and former UMass recruit, Natalie Neaton, a second team All-American last season, who has eight goals on the year.

UMass will benefit from the tournament schedule. William & Mary will play Duke on Saturday, in what should be a heated regional battle, then comes back the next day to face the Minutewomen.

Women's tennis to battle Hartford squad

By DAVE COPELAND
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team travels to the University of Hartford tomorrow to play a match that could turn out to be the turning point of its season.

Coming off an easy 9-0 win against Wesleyan on Tuesday, the team will try to even its record to 3-3 against a tough Hartford team. UMass head coach Judy Dixon feels that if her team can beat Hartford, they stand a good chance of holding their own against the rest of their opponents.

"Overall, I think we could be doing a little better this season," Dixon said. "[Tomorrow's] match is the midpoint of our season, and it could dictate the course of the rest of our matches."

Despite the shaky start, Dixon still holds high praise for the players on the team. Liesl Sitton, the team's number one singles player is 4-1 this fall. Despite a focus problem, Dixon said anytime Sitton gets on the court, she has at least an eighty percent chance of winning the match.

If she prepares well, Dixon said she expects her to be in the top four at the New England Championships later this month.

Lesley Watts has won all of her matches at number five, a spot that Dixon places a great amount of importance on.

"For us to be competitive, we need to win at five and six. Lesley has done well there, and that is probably where I'll have her playing next year."

But Dixon is not looking too far into the future just

Field hockey rolls over Lady Monarchs

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

The most successful athletic program at the University of Massachusetts added another chapter in its storied history book at Totman Field on Saturday when the No. 6 nationally ranked women's field hockey team out manned, out ran, out passed, out defended, and out gunned three time defending NCAA champion and second ranked Old Dominion University 2-0.

Massachusetts	2

"This is the sweetest victory I've ever had in my life," said senior co-captain Tracy Barclay, who began her collegiate field hockey career at ODU. "We creamed them. We completely ran over the No. 2 team in the nation."

The victory was even sweeter for the Minutewomen when you consider the fact that they had not defeated ODU since 1985 and were 2-12 lifetime against the Lady Monarchs entering Saturday's contest.

By playing ODU, the Minutewomen had absolutely nothing to lose. They weren't expected to win, so they just came out loose, relaxed and played their type of game, according to Massachusetts Coach Pam Hixon.

"We were the underdogs today," Hixon said. "That means we can step up and take some risks and play a little bit looser and that's just what we did; they just went right after it and played tenaciously."

The Minutewomen completely dominated the Monarchs in every facet of the game. Massachusetts had 27 shots and 10 penalty corners, compared to 5 shots and one penalty corners for the Lady Monarchs.

It was obvious from the outset that the Minutewomen were going to get their shots as the forward line of Tara Jelley, Danielle Borges, and Jenn Salisbury put an enormous amount of pressure on the ODU defense with their speed and stick handling. A Massachusetts goal seemed inevitable — it was only a matter of time before one of their shots snuck through.

That time came in the 45th minute when freshman sensation Kyle Rothenberger garnered her second game-winning goal in as many games to put Massachusetts ahead 1-0.

Rothenberger blasted a 15-footer past ODU goalkeeper Kim Decker at 45:08 on a penalty corner pass from Holly Hockenbrock and Salisbury.

"When that goal scored I thought, 'This is it, we're going to pull it off,'"

Anti-Yeltsin protestors ravage capital

By BARRY RENFREW
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Thousands of screaming hard line protesters armed with rocks, clubs and machine guns smashed through the government siege of parliament Sunday and sent police fleeing in battles across Moscow. It was the worst political violence in Moscow since the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution

Authorities said at least 24 civilians and soldiers were reported killed, and as many as 100 were injured.

A column of 40 armored vehicles loyal to President Boris Yeltsin rolled into central Moscow early today, taking up positions outside the Kremlin and Defense Ministry. It was the army's first major show of force during the nearly 2-week-old crisis between the government and hard-line lawmakers barricaded in parliament.

Yeltsin, rushing back to the Kremlin by helicopter from his country home, declared a state of emergency, giving police wide power to crack down on the protesters, and odd mix of communists, fascists and extreme nationalists united by their opposition to Yeltsin.

Thousands of unarmed Yeltsin supporters took to the streets to support the president, who dissolved parliament Sept. 21 in an effort to end his long power struggles with the Soviet-era parliament bent on hobbling his reforms.

The anti-government protesters struck suddenly and fiercely Sunday, beating young riot police in vicious street fighting and seizing Moscow's headquarters of city government.

They attacked the country's main television complex with rocket propelled grenades. Government paratroopers in armored personnel carriers sprayed them with machine-gun fire. Three TV channels went off the air, and fire raged this morning.

At least 20 civilians were killed and more than

Teachers oppose private schools

BOSTON (AP) — A push by Gov. William Weld to let a private company run Massachusetts public schools faces opposition from the state's biggest teacher's union.

The Edison Project, a schools venture chaired by former Yale University President Benno Schimidt, could contract out to run public schools under the state's education reform law, said state Education Commissioner Robert Antonucci.

For instance, the state could take over non-performing school districts and use the Edison Project to revamp their operations, Antonucci said.

Antonucci and the governor endorsed the Edison Project last week.

Conceived in 1991 as a private effort to open and run private schools, the Edison Project is funded by Philips Electronics Associated Newspapers Holding Co. and Christopher Whittle, chairman of Whittle Communications.

"Chris Whittle and Benno Schmidt are offering a refreshing new vision for our schools," Weld said through a spokesman. "What's more, the Edison Project's creativity and innovation may also inspire existing public schools here in Massachusetts to transform their own classrooms."

Robert Murphy, president of the Massachusetts Teachers Association, said he encourages the kind of reform offered by the Edison Project buy things it should come from the public school system.

"There are breakthroughs occurring in schools all around the country, both public and private," Murphy told the Boston Herald. "Whether or not this is the silver bullet and whether we should divert attention from the very important issues we're trying to confront is a question we ought to be dealing with."

Murphy said he was also worried that the financial backers of the Edison Project would help determine what students are taught.

Under Edison Project supervision, Massachusetts schools would see plenty of changes, Schmidt said. Among them:

• Students would begin schooling at age 3.

• Classrooms would be open 12 hours a day, with instruction extending form 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. in some cases.

• Summer vacation would be cut to six weeks.

The schools would encourage "creative and varied and fun curriculum, with a lot of emphasis on the arts and music and questions of morals and character and ethics," Schmidt said.

Campus smoking ban pushed up to Nov. 1

Ashtrays won't disappear from Campus Center tables for another month, as the campus-wide smoking ban scheduled to begin last Friday was delayed yet again.

Initially targeted to begin Sept. 1, the ban was delayed until Oct. 1 to give affected individuals time to take advantage of assistance programs and work out the new procedures. The policy will not be implemented until Nov. 1.

According to the Oct. 1 Campus Chronicle, Chancellor David K. Scott announced the second delay last week.

He told the Chronicle that the ban was postponed so administrators could receive clear guidellnes on the policy.

The Chronicle reported that "administrators are using the delay to resolve outstanding differences with union leaders."

Under the ban, the entire campus will be smoke-free with the exception of designated rooms in the Campus Center hotel and "certain University-owned and leased individual rooms and apartments," the Collegian reported in September.

University Health Services is offering smoking cessation classes to prepare individuals for the ban.

Two people injured in campus accident

Two people were hurt last night in a accident involving a motorcycle and a car at the intersection in front of the Lederle Graduate Research Tower.

The motorcycle was traveling straight at the intersection of Governors Drive and North Pleasant St., when the Mustang, turning right, hit the front right of the bike, according to eyewitnesses.

Phillip Assad, a sophomore chemical engineering major, who saw the accident, said the man who was riding the motorcyle was bleeding from the nose, while the women was not moving at all.

As of press-time, the Amherst Police Department and Cooley-Dicklnson Hospital would not release any information concerning the accident.

Bar may tighten rules on ads

BOSTON (AP) — Concerned that the image of lawyers is already too low, the Massachusetts Bar Association is considering tightening rules on attorneys' advertisements.

The two chairmen of a new committee of the Massachusetts Bar Association will meet this week to discuss possible changes.

Association spokesman Bill Litant said some advertisements go too far in encouraging people to file lawsuits.

"The gist of the ads is saying let's get together and see who we can sue," Litant told the Boston Herald. "Then people say lawyers are overly litigious and they say 'No we're not,' but then they go right out and but mere ads on television."

But some lawyers believe these advertisements are protected by First Amendment free-speech guarantees and they should be able to advertise just as any others business does.

"We can't go back to the horse-and-buggy days," said attorney Dane M. Shulman, who uses his attorney daughter, Jody, in his advertisements.

"It's gone too far to those who want to consider law a profession, the old one man office on the second floor," he said.

Shulman said his practices has grown by a third in the five years he has been advertising.

Boston defense attorney Thomas May doesn't advertise, but he said he sees some value in the advertisements.

The message is if you've been hurt, let's make sure that...you'll be compensated for it," he said.

Lawyer advertisements in Massachusetts are more discreet that those in some other states. In California, for example, a young man fans out a fan of $100 bills and promotes a law firm he says turns "motorcycle accidents into big cash awards." A Florida advertisement shows a young boy warning his barber he'll call attorney David Singer if the barber cuts his ear.

Massachusetts Bar Association President Michael Mone said it's "just a matter of time" before similar ads appear in the Bay State.

Festival helps support Amherst Family Center

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Correspondent

Saturday's Apple Harvest and Crafts Festival on the Amherst Town Common marked the true beginning of autumn.

The festival, an annual event for seven years, was set up and run by over 300 volunteers from Amherst and surrounding communities.

Atkins Fruit Bowl and radio station WMAS were the two major sponsors this year. All proceeds from the festival went to the Amherst Family Center.

The Center provides help, community and education to families with young children. It is a non-profit organization serving the greater Hampshire County area.

Marie Hartwell-Walker, chairperson of the festival, explained how the Amherst Family Center relies heavily on profits from the event to supplement its budget.

"The family center runs on a shoestring. It's only a $30,000 budget. We service 250 to 300 families a year and, of that $30,000, this fair makes at least $10,000 every year," she said.

The main attractions at the festival were an apple pie contest and raffle prizes. A 10 home game package to University of Massachusetts basketball games was the grand prize in the raffle. Additional prizes included a one month membership at the Amherst Athletic Club, pizza passes from Charlie's, and various gift certificates.

Other major attractions at the festival were the children's activities. Face painting, honeycomb candle making and miniature golf were just a few of the many events scheduled. One of the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles was also there to entertain the youngsters.

There was also a huge food section in the Commons, serving pizza, nachos and homemade ice cream. Local area farms sold fresh vegetables and stands offered home baked goods such as apple cider donuts, apple cheese bread and apple cake for sale.

The biggest part of the festival this year was the 143 craft vendors selling their wares.

People from all over New England, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania come to the crafts festival.

"We have about 40 percent of our regulars who come back every year, and then we always have our newcomers," Hartwell-Walker said.

She also said that not just anyone can decide to sell their crafts at the festival because it is a juried event.

"...Which means that every crafter has to send photographs of their work to be judged by a panel of artists and crafts people. The people who pass are allowed to [display their work]," she said.

Some of the crafts on display were woodcarving, silhouettes, homemade kaleidoscopes, jewelry, pottery and paintings. A new item this year was a German craft, Beeswax carving.

Following the festival was the Boltwood Festival. This community block party took place from 4 p.m. to 9 p.m. in the Boltwood Walk area. Activities such as live music, dances and music all added to the festivities.

"This festival has been a main attraction for the past seven years. It has been important because of the fact that the money goes to the Amherst family center," Joanna Ritter, a UMass student and Amherst resident, said. "The Apple Harvest and Crafts Festival was also always a symbol of the beginning of fall."

Franklin seat is up for grabs

Politicians are working toward state rep. position

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

The First Franklin District state representative seat is now open to a new face and possibly a new party after being held for 21 years by Jay Healy, a Republican.

The seat became vacant in June when Governor William Weld appointed Healy to be the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The primary, held Sept. 14, limited the choice of three Democratic candidates to one: Steven Kulik of Worthington. The Republican opposition in the election will be Edmund Smith of Buckland. The First Franklin District is the largest geographical district, covering 19 towns, but is also the most rural.

"The district has become more Democratic over the past decade," Kulik said. Healy was a liberal Republican, according to Kulik, which is why he remained in the seat for so long.

Kulik labeled himself a "progressive" Democrat and believes he can bring many more resources to his district if elected because the Democrats are the majority party in the legislature.

Each candidate is concerned with representing rural Massachusetts at the state legislature in Boston. Both Smith and Kulik believe the state is withholding money in Boston that should be sent to the western part of the commonwealth.

Smith is a former dairy farmer. His campaign manager, Bob Godin, said it is very important to have a farming background.

"Farming is hard," Godin said. "They have just about everything going against them. It is necessary to have someone in the district that has a good understanding and heartfelt sense of what the people need."

Both Smith and Kulik served as selectmen in their respective towns, Smith for 12 years and Kulik for 10 years.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors at the University of Massachusetts, a branch of the Massachusetts Teachers Association, chose to endorse Kulik.

Nine members of the board and nine members of the district met to interview all the candidates before the primary and chose which person would best serve the University.

"We agreed Steve was the strongest candidate," Leo Richards, the president of the society said. "The other candidates knew almost nothing about the University."

The board was unable to interview Smith because he entered the race at the last possible date.

Richards said that, usually, Amherst representatives know the needs of the University and how the campus works, but he believes boarding districts should also be familiar with the University due to the large number of students and staff that live within the districts.

The First Franklin District has over 80 faculty members and roughly 800 University employees, as well as an undetermined number of students living within it, particularly in Sunderland.

"Anyone who represents the district should realize that the University is the single largest employer of his or her constituents, as well as a large number of stu-

Local drive benefits poor in Amherst

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday, the Amherst Town Common was the sight of the fifth annual Shelter Sunday, a fundraising benefit for the homeless and underprivileged in the Amherst area.

The door-to-door solicitation of Amherst neighborhoods raised money for four local charitable organizations. Shelter Sunday is sponsored by Amherst Friends for the Homeless, Inc., a nonprofit organization which addresses the problems of the needy in the Amherst area. This year's event drew approximately 120 volunteers.

Organizations receiving funds raised on Shelter Sunday are the Amherst Survival Center, which donates meals, clothing and groceries and Not Bread Alone, a soup kitchen which provides meals on Saturdays and Sundays at the First Congregational Church in Amherst. Also included are the Grove Street Inn, a homeless shelter in Northampton and the Amherst Charitable Fund, a group which provides financial help for low income families in Amherst.

Hill Boss, who coordinated the Shelter Sunday project, estimated this year's event raised between $12,000 and $15,000 dollars, about the same amount donated in the past few years. Boss noted he was hoping for a larger total, but only a portion of the volunteers appeared on Sunday.

"Had all volunteers showed up, we'd be shooting for $18,000 to $20,000," said Boss. "We had a number of primary areas that simply did not get covered."

Shelter Sunday was originally created to raise funds for Rosemary's Place, an Amherst shelter for homeless single women which operated from 1989 until 1991. When Rosemary's Place closed down, Amherst Friends for the Homeless, Inc., decided to continue the Shelter Sunday program to benefit other local charities.

"Because Shelter Sunday was our way of raising money and it was so successful, we decided to

IRA invites peace talks in Northern Ireland

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) — The Irish Republican Army welcomed Sunday a new peace initiative by two parties in Northern Ireland, saying it has a "vested interest" in ending a quarter-century of bloodshed.

The IRA, which is fighting the British rule in the province, said that although the British government has reacted negatively to the plan, "if the political will exists or can be created, it could provide the basis for peace." Its statement was issued in Dublin.

The leader of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political wing and one of the two parties behind the peace plan, said the current talks could mean peace for the province after 25 years of bloodshed, a report said.

"This is one of the best opportunities for peace since what are now called the troubles began in 1968," Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams was quoted as saying in the Independent on Sunday.

Adams has been meeting since April with John Hume, leader of the mainstream Roman Catholic Social Democratic and Labor Party. They submitted a report on their progress to the Irish government a week ago, but details have not been released.

Adams and Hume said, however, that their plan proposes the participation in talks of all political parties in Northern Ireland, as well as the British and Irish governments.

More than 3,000 people have died in 25 years of political and sectarian violence in Northern Ireland.

The IRA statement came just two days after the group set off three bombs in north London, injuring five people.

dents interests, Richards said.

The board supported a candidate who it felt would help the University in the state legislature.

Kulik is very concerned with the quality of education. "My goal is for the state to put more money into education," he said, because he thinks higher education is "short changing" students.

Smith wants to go to Boston and "free up some of the money" that should be coming to the west. He is very concerned about the farming economy and would like to improve conditions for the farmers.

The election will be on Oct. 12.

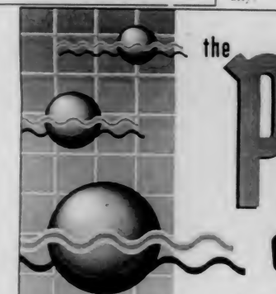
to keep it going to raise money for other organizations that serve the homeless," said Betsy Johnson, a founding member of Amherst Friends for the Homeless and organizer of Shelter Sunday.

Boss noted that the economic recession in the past few years increased the need for programs which benefit the poor in Amherst.

"As far as hunger is concerned, the demand on both the Survival Center and the soup kitchen is greater than ever," said Boss.



"Jobs are still lost. Stores are still closing. Until people start to work again, this problem will exist continually."

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Gay parents are fighting invisibility, prejudice.

The right wing's prim and proper Pats, Robertson and Buchanan, must have been quite disturbed when they picked up their copies of the New York Times last Thursday morning. (Of course, it is doubtful that either of these God-fearing gentlemen would ever allow such a vile, radical, perverse journal inside of their homes.) But upon reading a report by Susan Chira announcing that "Gay Parents Become Increasingly Visible," even the twin Pats had something to smile about.

While homosexuality and bisexuality rightly became more accepted by our often clamped-minded society, there were still some obscene acts of bigotry for Ms. Chira to report. Such as a case in Richmond, Va., three weeks ago, when lesbian mother Sharon Bottoms lost custody of her son to her mother — a mother who, during Sharon's childhood, had allowed her boyfriend to rape Sharon.

In Bellingham, Wash., a natural mother is seeking to regain custody of her three-year-old son, given up for adoption a year ago, because a gay couple might adopt the child. And again in Virginia, a lesbian mother who remained anonymous was forced by a judge to choose between her partner and her children.

"We don't condone homosexuality in any way," said Joseph Knapp of the Family Research Institute in Woodbridge, Va. "We believe that being raised by homosexuals is detrimental to children. Our family values are a mom and a dad rearing the child."

Peter ORVETTI

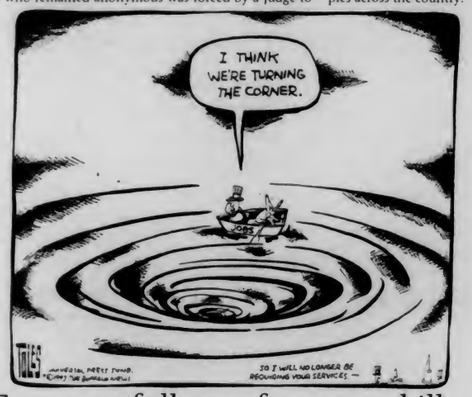
But Child Development last year published a review of research projects that show absolutely no psychological disadvantages for children raised by gay parents. There was also no effect on the children's sexual orientation. The children turned out just the same.

If not better. For there is often more love, more respect in a gay or lesbian household. Perhaps this is a result of the hardship and the prejudice — the families have to be stronger, closer together, and more caring, because the family members have to defend themselves against the narrow minded. We're here, we're queer, and we're parents, say the gay and lesbian couples across the country.

"We used to say we were invisible, but no longer," says father of two, Tim Fisher, who lives with his partner in Montclair, N.J.



On the other side of the American continent, in Washington, Abraham Valencia once had to tear down all the curtains in his house to prove to his neighbors that he was not forcing pornography on his young sons. Now moved to Tacoma, Valencia, he has posted a sign on his front door reading, Visibly Queer. His three sons don't seem to mind and neither do his neighbors.

In fact, the only people who do mind are the bigoted and the ignorant, the sort who would strip Sharon Bottoms's child from a loving mother and pass it to a sexually abusive one. People like Pat and Pat, and Joseph Knapp, and even the people who mutter "faggot" under their breath as they walk through Northampton.

Kate Ransom-Walsh is now 13 years old. When she was seven, she found out that her father is gay.

"I was pretty surprised, but it wasn't that big a deal," she says. "The only thing that worries me is that people in my school don't accept anyone who is different."

The sperm bank tragedy

Sometimes I feel like technology has passed me by. Two weeks ago, I read about a new sperm bank opening in my hometown, Cambridge. This particular firm opens all their banks around colleges because people naturally tend to prefer educated donors.

Am I the only one who has a problem with this? I love my computer. I couldn't function without my remote control. But do we really need a sperm bank in every college town? Saturday Night Live's Grumpy Old Man might say, "In my day we didn't have any of these fancy shmancy sperm banks. If we wanted to have a baby, we had to do the dirty deed — and we liked it!"

Derek MILOSAVLJEVIC

Don't get me wrong. I appreciate the technology for what it's worth. If a man, for some reason is unable to help conceive a child with his partner, this is a viable alternative. However, many of the customers of these services are women who for whatever reason, want to have a child on their own.

Even for those who are physically unable to conceive their own child, this should not be ignored just so a couple's ego can be satisfied knowing at least one set of their genes lives in their child.

This bank pays $35 to the donors for each deposit. Meanwhile, the recipients pay thousands of dollars for the service.

I wonder if Harvard sperm costs more that UMass sperm, or blue eyes cost more than brown. What makes it okay for these women to try to build the perfect baby like some kind of genetic Mr. Potato Head?

Of course, if I say that I want a wife who is at least six feet tall so my son will have a chance in the NBA, I'm a pig.

Naturally, this system is set up so the children never find out who their biological father is. Haven't we seen in the case of adoption that people have a natural instinct to want to find out where they came from? What gives us the right to deny any child the chance to find his roots?

These roots are being sold, as many as 10 times per a donor, for $35 dollars a pop. For the price of two or three cases of beer, struggling college students are selling their history; the joy and pain of their ancestors, with no hope of ever seeing the product.

At the time, these young men may just see quick dollar signs, but for the rest of their lives they must live with the knowledge that they have given away a part of so many people.

There is a another part of this business that bothers me. It is just plain dangerous. The worst-case scenario: A college student (we'll call him Derek), looking for extra money, sells his sperm. He graduates a year later, lands a high-paying job, and marries a supermodel. The young couple live a story-book life, raising a beautiful daughter named Athena, who makes her parents proud by receiving a full academic scholarship to Harvard.

Meanwhile, some discerning women has chosen Derek's sperm, conceived the child, and with the man she married when her child was two, raises him to be a wonderful young man. Her son Rickey, chooses to go to Harvard, where he quarterbacks the football team to four straight undefeated seasons. He wins three Heisman Trophies in the process.

Athena and Rickey meet during their senior year, find they have everything in common and naturally fall in love. Of course, both sets of parents are delighted when the couple announces their wedding plans, ignorant of the fact that Derek is Rickey's biological father.

Twenty five or 30 years after making a quick decision that paid for a few pizzas, we all know what Derek ends up with, a grandchild with a southern accent and a pick-up truck.

In all seriousness, this scenario could be played out, and in all likelihood, it will be. We need legislation that regulates this practice, or I guarantee it will be the topic on Donahue 30 years from now. It's not necessary. It's not right, and it's just not safe.

Derek Milosavljevic is a UMass student.

For some folks perfume overkill can be too much of a good thing

The impending smoking ban has raised some issues of air quality on campus, but I wish to bring attention to another, less politicized air contaminant: perfume overdose.

Like many people in the Valley, I have asthma and allergies. Some of my most severe problems have been triggered by heavy perfume.

Last week, I walked into a meeting and was overwhelmed, not by the scent, but by the chemical fumes hanging in the air.

I wound up in Urgent Care getting an updraft. The following night, my two kids and I had to leave a dance concert in mid-performance after we were all overcome by the perfume of a woman who sat next to us.

The medications I've had to take since my attack last Wednesday have had a number of side effects, including muscle weakness which has forced me to use a cane. And all this, I marvelled to my children, because somebody wore too much perfume.

A gentle touch of scent may be very pleasant, but too much of a good thing can be dangerous. Toxicity is frequently unrelated to any pleasure factor.

There are some scents which, lightly applied, make me want to follow the wearer for half a block or so. But even my favorite scent, when laid on too strong, will make me rasp and hack.

I do not advocate abandoning products which people find necessary for personal comfort or hygiene. But it does seem to me that in areas which are likely to be crowded, hot, or poorly ventilated (which generally includes busses, concert halls, classrooms, meeting rooms, and churches), we would be better off to leave perfumes and colognes behind, or at least apply them sparingly.

Certainly the bronchial airways and sinuses of many of us would appreciate it.

By using racism as a crutch and an excuse we will never overcome it

Let me start off by saying I am not a racist person. I have gone out of my way to educate myself on issues of diversity. I make an attempt to be politically correct in an attempt not to offend anyone.

I consider myself an ally to minorities, sympathetic to their past struggles and those they must continually overcome on a daily basis. I know of many other White individuals, like myself, who are making an all out effort to combat racism on this campus.

Now I am not trying to deny that racism exists on this campus. However, I am sick and tired of some minorities who insist on using racism as a crutch, an excuse and who try to detect racism in a situation when in fact none is present.

For example, I am an resident assistant, and this past weekend I was forced to document a woman on my floor for breaking various policies.

Let me elaborate.

This woman had a party in her room. She had propped an emergency door open, and at least a dozen people came into the building without being signed in. She also charged money at the door.

Her guests were, among other things, smoking and drinking in the hallway, smashing oranges against the walls, vomiting on the walls, yelling, and etc.

Not surprisingly, this disturbed and upset many of the residents on the hall who were in for the night.

I had responded to these violations, as I have been trained to.

When I informed this resident that she would be documented and asked her to clean the wreckage left in the hallway, I was accused of being racist.

The resident was Puerto Rican and so were the majority of her guests.

I was told that had she been White I would not have been so tough on her.

The fact that this offender was Puerto Rican never once crossed my mind. I would have responded to the violations the same way, no matter what her ethnicity.

It disturbs me that someone would try to use racism as an excuse in a situation such as this. Smarten up! Racism goes both ways, and with some people using racism as an excuse we will never overcome it.

Child support dodgers cause revenue woes

BOSTON (AP) — Child support enforcers need a better system to crack down on deadbeat parents in other states to help collect more than $150 million owed to Massachusetts residents, a Revenue Department official says.

"It's a common tactic that the easiest way to avoid paying is to leave the state," Bob Melia, director of strategic planning for the Revenue Department, said. "There is an unbelievable amount of paperwork involved in transmitting child-support cases to other states."

Out of state residents owe more than $150 million in unpaid child support, and more than $48.2 is owed by parents whose addresses are known.

Cheryl Castle, a Dracut mother of two, said she has been trying to collect child support from her shusband, who owes more than $54,000 and lives in Florida.

"The Department of Revenue took the case in 1991 and since then I have not received a cent," Castle told the Boston Sunday Herald.

"They know where he is. They have his address in Florida. He is comfortable. He had a sailboat and a car. I don't have a car," she said.

Revenue Department spokesman Brian Pedro said six employees are handling the more than 30,000 interstate child support cases and another six are being hired.

Melia said while 75 percent of parents who live in Massachusetts are under child support orders to pay up, the compliance rate drops to 35 percent for out-of-staters.

"People need to add their voices to the demand for change," Melia said. "We have a lot of tradition that is simply not workable in the late 20th century when you can get in an automobile and drive hundreds of miles."

Florida, where each county runs its own child support system, and where Castle's husband lives, is a prime example of the problem, Melia said.

"If a person moves from one county to another, the new county won't recognize any work you've done in the other county," he said.

Pedro said Castle's ex-husband was an expert at playing the system, moving to a new Florida county every time the Massachusetts Revenue Department started to close in.

100 were injured, excluding casualties from the broadcast station, said Igor Nadezhdin, an official with Moscow's main medical authority. In addition, fighting killed four soldiers and injured dozens, city officials said without elaboration. Exact figures were impossible to gather.

The Interfax news agency reported eight people were killed in fighting at the TV complex, but there was no immediate confirmation.

Hard line lawmakers urged their triumphant followers to seize other installations and take control of the government. They chanted "Yankee Go Home" and called for Yeltsin's overthrow and the "liquidation" of his government.

"We have to take the Kremlin" parliament speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov told the parliament, referring to the government seat of power where Yelstin was in his office.

There were no reports of unrest in the rest of the country, nor across most of Moscow. During the sunny Sunday, most Muscovites strolled, boated on the river or packed farmer's markets to buy autumn harvest goods.

In addition to the armored vehicles that arrived early today, government forces were guarding the Kremlin, and pro-Yeltsin supporters erected barricades near the Kremlin and at City Hall.

Crimmins to give comic social criticism

By JEFFREY GRAHAM
Collegian Correspondent

As well-paid critics said of comedian and social critic extraordinaire Barry Crimmins, this guy is a must see. His show tonight at the Iron Horse in Northampton will benefit the Media/Ed Foundation's upcoming video, "The Myth of Liberal Media."

In an era of tightly controlled corporate media, Crimmins is someone you definitely should know about. To watch him as a poetic rabble-rouser in concert is a comic experience you will never forget.

Crimmins distills the madness of the 20th century into a hilarious and often terrifying beauty. He paints a caricature of America gone mad, and he expresses it with a generosity of spirit and unimpeachable intelligence.

The comedian's talent is in exposing the ridiculousness of modern America, offering his own take on reality.

"I will not negotiate with terrorists. These prices are firm," he comments on former President Ronald Reagan.

On Dan Quayle at a press conference, Crimmins likens him to "a kid trying to get past his parents, drunk," while Robert Bork is questioned as an "intellectual conservative."

"I guess that means a thug with excellent grammar," he concludes.

And on the invisible and costly Stealth Bomber, he chides, "why don't we just say we have it?

Those who laugh, endure. That is why Crimmins was so important to exhausted anti-war activists during the Persian Gulf War. As he toured college campuses and offered improvised inspiration at demonstrations, Crimmins never watered down his criticism of the war makers rhetoric.

As one student who attended a college-sponsored discussion at which Crimmins spoke, noted that in 10 minutes, "Barry did more to get people to see how outrageous the war was than 10 hours of speeches."

At the Iron Horse tonight, Crimmins sets his sights on the mass media's unfailing efforts to promote apathy and confusion. The concert is being videotaped for international distribution, and Crimmins' performance is sure to be explosively funny and razor-sharp.

For anyone dismayed at our society and the media's portrayal of it, this show is a must see.

Professor perfects classical guitar skills

COURTESY PHILLIP DE FREMERY
Professor Philip de Fremery

By JEDEDIAH CURTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Phillip de Fremery's 28-year-old courtship with the classical guitar began at the age of 17 when he heard a recording by Andres Segovia.

"When I heard [that recording], I knew that I had to somehow learn how to [play like that]," Fremery said.

After unsuccessfully trying to teach himself the classical style, Fremery's fortune changed.

"As luck would have it, Segovia himself came to California to teach his first master class ever in the United States," Fremery said. "I knew I couldn't qualify for the class because I couldn't even play one piece all the way through."

He was, however, able to observe the master class, which met for four hours everyday for a month. And, when the master class was over, two of the top players from that class, Michael Lorimer and George Sacalaria, settled in California. Fremery befriended both players, and studied with Michael Lorimer.

From the beginning, Fremery's efforts to learn the classical guitar were hampered by an accident he suffered while working with an electric joiner in a woodshop: the loss of the tip of his right index finger. To make up the length, he wears a prosthetic device while playing.

"Curiously, it ended up being an advantage because it forced me to develop the other fingers more than I believe I would have otherwise been caused to do," Fremery said.

Fremery's hard work payed off: when one of Segovia's protegees, Oscar Ghiglia, gave a master class in Los Angeles, Fremery was accepted to play. Afterwards, he followed Ghiglia to New York, Utah, and Colorado. In 1966, he arranged for Ghiglia to give a master class in San Francisco.

It wasn't hard to find work as a classical guitarist in the late '60s according to Fremery.

"You had very few players at the concert level in the United States," he said.

Also the beginning of Fremery's concert career coincided with an increased public interest in the classical guitar, largely the result of Segovia's sudden visibility in the United States.

He moved to South Hadley, Mass. in 1975 after various frustrations overcame him througout his career in the '60s. Fremery then took a job cooking and bartending.

In November of 1975 he made a drastic change to his sound: he stopped plucking the strings with his right hand fingernails, instead he used only the pads of his right hand fingers to sound the guitar.

"I was the type of player who put an awful lot of selection in sound and tone color. I felt there was some limitation [to that sound and tone color when playing with fingernails]," Fremery said."

Because of the changes he made, Fremery had to relearn how to play the guitar. And, it has been a slow recovery because he has to reclaim his playing abilities, Fremery said.

He kept his restaurant job until 1985. He credits it with improving his performing ability by teaching him "how

Involvement brings social opportunities

I considered myself extremely involved in high school—socially, politically, somewhat romantically, influentially, and, oh yeah, academically.

First things first. Not to intentionally boast about my high school's great success, I would like to give you a little background on this college preparatory institution.

James Logan High School in Union City, Calif., is one of the most populated and largest high schools in the state, and ranked one of the most culturally diverse schools in the nation. Did I mention that we also have the first 7-Eleven on a high school campus in the world?

First Things First
by Jeff Coker

The school offers vast opportunities to its students, and my friends and schoolmates at home can testify that I have taken advantage of them. I believe in involvement to such a great extent that I launched a short campaign to get involved in school activities through one of my editorials as editor-in-chief of the school newspaper, the Courier. I also spoke to freshman classes about getting involved early, to expand themselves by finding and developing their interests.

Involvement did not help me to grow or learn, but it broadened my knowledge and enhanced my perspective on issues that surround my everyday life.

I figured that when I reached the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, I would go out and search for groups that would contribute to my interests. I joined the Distinguished Visitors Program that brought Dr. Mae Jemison, the first Afro-American female astronaut, to our campus.

I am working with MASSPIRG (I'm sure you saw the hundreds of flyer blanketing the campus last Wednesday). I write for The Collegian (obviously), and I am president of my dorm, Wheeler, with interactions with the Student Government Association and the Central Area Government.

I realize this is a heavy load in addition to my classes. However, I am just checking out these highly respected organizations to see, on the most part, if I want to continue with them.

First things first. I urge all of you, whether you are a blessed first year student or an ego step ahead, to find some of your interests in the surrounding campus community. It is the first time you'll ever read that

Blues Imperials knock out Bluewall

BY JEFF COKER
Collegian Staff

The floors were bouncing and the walls were shaking Friday evening when Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials gave meaning to the University of Massachusetts Blue Wall cafe along with opening performer, local slide guitarist Mark Nomad.

University Productions and Concerts put together the hand-smacking event that attracted about 200 blues seekers to hear the sounds of Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials as the band made UMass a slammin' stop on their tour. The band performed songs from their newest release, What You See Is What You Get, their third recording from Alligator Records. Friday's show was a part of UPC's Jazz and Blues Series.

I walked into the Blue Wall not knowing a diddly-do about the blues and left a Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials fan.

"We all need to know, as the younger generation, what the blues is all about and how to have a good time," Lil' Ed Williams later told me, and thus, he conveyed it most eloquently.

And when the band amplified the action, the bass practically pushed me out of my chair and kept my head bobbing in steady motion.

Throughout the evening, several dozen members of the anxious crowd charged for the open floor in front of the band and danced until the end of the show.

One of the most attracting highlights was when Lil' Ed hopped onto second guitarist Mike Garrett's shoulders and both played their tunes while dancing in locomotion through the gathered blues goers. Then, the two layed on the floor and stringed their guitars in pretentious activity.

Slide guitarist Mark Nomad's appreciation for the blues came out in both his music and his words.

"The blues are a timeless, healing music," said Nomad, who has a compact disc out in local record stores called Nomad's Land.

Nomad played a variety of his songs, including "Watch Yourself" and "Green Eyes".

"I would invite everybody to come out and check out this music themselves—for joy and healing," he said.

"I'm really glad that we're doing the Jazz and Blues Series this semester, and I hope people will take advantage of the bands that UPC presents," said UPC promotions director Mindy Peden.

UPC has had problems in the past putting together events because of a lack of student interest, according to UPC multicultural talent coordinator Jose Davila.

In addition, UPC is aiming to present bands that do not perform alternative rock.

Robert Cray and John Hammond are scheduled to appear Nov. 10 at the UMass Fine Arts Center. Tickets will go on sale Oct. 6 at the Fine Arts Center Box Office. They are $16 for UMass students with a valid ID and $18 for all others.

to serve people and how to be sincere."

These days, he teaches part time at Amherst College, Mount Holyoke College, Holyoke community College, and Westfield State College.

Of his students, he says, "What they want is what I've got. I know I got it from the people who know it best. It's a joy to pass it on."

His former students include Benjamin Verdery, Eliot Fisk, and Sharon Isbin. All rank among today's best players, he said.

Fremery goes out on the road to give performances every three years, although this will be the second consecutive year that he's gone on tour. He sees himself as a performer, more than anything else.

"In my mind that's who I am. I consider it my career, even though I'm not making a living at it. And if I never make it, I'll still feel that's who I am," Fremery said.

Currently, he's working on making a digital tape of himself, which he hopes will give him more exposure.

He acknowledges that it's harder to make a career out of the classical guitar today than it was when he started because of the large number of skilled players, but feels that with dedication, it is not impossible.

"I think if a person is going to make a career out of something that has a kind of wild card nature to it, that the person is simply going to do it. Your determination to do it is going to protect you from things that may feel negative to others," Fremery said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You find yourself the center of attention at work. New insights result from a candid conversation with someone you respect. Keep your political ideas to yourself.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Stay three steps ahead of the crowd and success will be yours. Your winning personality and quick wit make you popular with members of the opposite sex. Plan for the future.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You are breaking new ground now, so go slow. Outside forces favor a new relationship. Pay more attention to details and you will save an employer money.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Keep an appointment with a doctor or dentist. A checkup could convince you to do some serious thinking about your lifestyle. Change what you do not like.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Meditation leads to greater self-knowledge. Doing business with a friend who has romantic intentions is not a good idea. A dream comes true. Celebrate with your favorite person.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Hard work brings big gains now. Taking a realistic approach has paid off. Your creativity is at a peak. Make the most of it! Pay attention to a strong hint from a romantic partner.

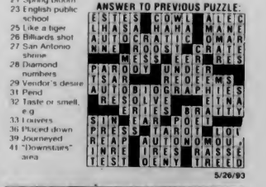
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Harmony on the home front puts you in a cheerful mood. Tackle projects you can best complete on your own. Put your best foot forward at a difficult meeting.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Keep your emotions under control even if someone drops a bombshell. You need to clear up something in your past. Opt for contact if decorating your home.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): VIPs are more congenial than usual. An influential friend delivers on a promise. Your reputation shines thanks to teamwork. Business and pleasure seems to mix nicely.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Continue to work hard today even if authority figures do not seem to notice. Eventually, they will realize who is really indispensable. A romantic relationship enters a new stage.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You and your associates are in agreement about most issues. A willingness to make intelligent concessions leads to rapid progress. Your intuition is right on target.



PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Harping on past mistakes could prove costly. Play down any areas of disagreement and emphasize your goal will. Romance could have you on an emotional rollercoaster. Keep cool.

University of Massachusetts Weekend Sports Results

MEN'S SOCCER

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team dropped a pair of games this weekend, 4-0 to St. Joseph's on Saturday and a 4-3 loss at the hands of Temple on Sunday despite a three goal effort from senior Randy Jacobs. The losses drop the Minutemen to 2-8 on the season and 1-3 in the Atlantic 10.

WATER POLO

The University of Massachusetts water polo team, ranked No. 13 in the nation, won a pair of games at the Eastern Water Polo Association Tournament at M.I.T. this weekend.

The Minutemen (9-3) defeated St. Francis 14-4 behind senior Tasan Engin and freshmen Ron Gonen and Gary Spremullo, who each tallied three goals. Engin led UMass to a 19-7 victory over Queens with eight goals.

VOLLEYBALL

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team earned its first Atlantic 10 victory on Friday with a 3-1 win over St. Bonaventure University. Freshman Susan Maga led the Minutewomen victory with a 17 kill, 22 dig performance.

The Minutewomen were less successful on Saturday and Sunday, however, losing to Duquesne and West Virginia by identical 3-0 scores.

Barclay said. "After that, I knew we were going to do it."

"I didn't come to UMass expecting to be a scorer," Rothenberger said. "I'm given the opportunities and if I can put it in, that's just an added advantage for the team."

Junior Natalie Hart added the icing on the Massachusetts cake at 59:50 when her penalty corner shot was tipped over Decker's head by an onrushing Monarch defender. The goal was Hart's seventh on the season to increase her team leading point total to 17.

Not to be lost in the shuffle was the outstanding play of junior midfielder Colleen Duffy, who was making her first start since the season-opening loss to Northwestern University.

The type of stuff Duffy showed on Saturday will not appear on any stat sheet. Diving for control of every loose ball in her area, picture-perfect stick handling, and passes that threaded the needle of the Lady Monarchs were all the intangibles Duffy did so well for the Minutewomen on Saturday that helped them gain control of the game.

"I needed a couple of weeks to get ready and in shape," Duffy said. "And I felt like this was the day. I wanted to show myself and the team that I wanted to be in there for them."

The magnitude of a victory against a team of ODU's caliber and reputation was not lost on the Minutewomen.

"This win gives us so much confidence," Rothenberger said. "We feel like we're ready to take on anybody."

I-AA program.

The problem is not with the program and its divisional status; it is with the promotion of the team. The Ivys live and die with I-AA pigskin. So does national power Delaware. Hey, the Minutemen are in the same conference as the Blue Hens.

Up here in Amherst, this columnist would like to see UMass play like champions, and I don't care where it is, as long as my school wins.

In the movie Field of Dreams, it is said, "If you build it, they will come." My sentiments exactly.

• In its first year since extinction back in 1991, Coach Bonnie Kenny's volleyball team is holding its own, posting a 7-6 record thus far. The club is doing it without many, if any, scholarships. Figure that one out. If Kenny and company can do it, it is an inspiration for other small programs to stay on the rise.

• The men's soccer team is finding that expectations are not easy to live with. After losing two more Atlantic 10 games this weekend, it looks as though the Minutemen will not be able to salvage what could have been a great season. Some things you just can't understand. You just accept them.

Arthur Stapleton is a Collegian columnist.

runs of 61 yards and 31 yards where he wasn't touched.

"I've never done four touchdowns before, never," said Ingoglia. "I was pretty fortunate. Those five guys [at offensive line] opened up big holes and I just tried to hit the holes hard."

Perry had six tackles, eight more assists and a ferocious sack of Dukes' quarterback Mike Cawley which resulted in a safety. It was the first game in which the preseason All-America candidate showed his entire repertoire.

"The last couple of games we were flustered," said Perry. "We have the best defense in the conference, but our defense is used to playing straight up, like we did today."

The largest crowd since the 1988 Homecoming game was there to see the bands (2,600 instrumentalists from 46 high schools) as much as the football team, but the drubbing increases the chance fans will come back again.

Even the quiet, lesser-known players had big games. Matt Rajotte had three first-half interceptions. Jason Mumford, a surprise starter at safety, had a career day in coverage and on the blitz.

Silas Burke and Ben Albert controlled the line of scrimmage on defense. Tailbacks Frank Alessio and John Johnson combined for over 100 yards. Offensive tackle Todd Tinker, a third-stringer, performed well in place of Dan Markowski.

The team redeemed itself — until next week — when it has another home contest against Rhode Island. The Minutemen are 2-0 at home. And, while they don't know why Alumni Stadium enhances their level of play, they are happy to be at home.

"It's hard to tell, but maybe we play tougher early in the game at home," Ingoglia said. "I thought we'd have a big crowd today. I expected it. Hopefully next week there'll be 16,000 in the stands."

It was the type of day the UMass football program needs more of.

Braves hold off Giants, face Phillies in NLCS

• Atlanta, Glavine defeat Rockies 5-3

By TOM SALADINO
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Even after winning 104 games, the Atlanta Braves still had to wait and watch.

Instead of being able to celebrate an NL West title after Sunday's 5-3 victory against Colorado, the Braves went back to their clubhouse to watch San Francisco play Los Angeles and determine if a one-game playoff would be needed to decide the division.

Tom Glavine won his 22nd game on the final scheduled day of the regular season. But the Braves then had to wait for the Giants, who played the Dodgers in Los Angeles.

Atlanta and San Francisco began the day in a tie for first, only the second time since divisional play began in 1969 that teams were even going into the final day.

In 1982, Milwaukee beat Baltimore on the last day to win the AL East.

As they have each day this weekend, Atlanta went ahead early and put pressure on San Francisco. The victory gave the two-time NL West champions a 13-0 sweep of the Rockies, the first time this century an NL team swept a season series from a rival.

Glavine (22-6) won for the eighth time in nine starts, allowing three runs and six hits in six and two-thirds innnings with four strikeouts and one walk. Greg McMichael pitched the final two innings for his 19th save in 21 chances.

Glavine left after Roberto Mejia's solo homer closed Atlanta's lead to 4-3 in the seventh, but David Justice hit his 40th homer in the bottom half, a high drive down the right-field line off Garry Wayne.

"We showed character," said Justice. "They [the Giants] showed a lot of character, too. It's unfortunate one of us had to go home. I'm just happy it's them."

"It's nice to have a couple of nights to relax and know where we're going for a change," said Glavine.

"It's definitely gratifying to do it the way we did it, chasing them all year, catching them and then finishing it on the last day," said Sid Bream.

• San Francisco drubbed by Dodgers, 10-1

By JOHN NADEL
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Three minutes before the first pitch Sunday, the San Francisco Giants knew exactly what they had to do.

They didn't do it.

After the Braves beat the Colorado Rockies 5-3 in Atlanta, the Giants had to defeat their long-time rival to force a one-game playoff for the NL West title.

Instead, their surprising season ended with a 10-1 loss to the Los Angeles Dodgers, giving the Braves their third straight NL West title.

The Giants, who finished 103-59, became the first team since the 1954 New York Yankees to win this many games and finish second.

It was only the eighth time in major league history — the first since 1980 — that a team with 100 wins didn't finish first.

San Francisco, which recovered from an eight-game losing streak by winning 14 of 16 before Sunday, staked its hopes on Salomon Torres, a 21-year-old rookie making his eighth big-league start.

Torres (3-5) watched the Braves' victory on television, but then couldn't get through the fourth inning, allowing three runs and five hits while walking five.

The Dodgers, who lost the first three games of the series, counted on Kevin Gross (13-13), a 32-year-old right-hander who hasn't had a winning record since 1985.

Gross pitched a six-hitter for only his third complete game this year, and Mike Piazza homered twice and drove in four runs.

Former Giant Cory Snyder and rookie Raul Mondesi also homered.

Not even the magic of Oct. 3 helped the Giants. Bobby Thomson, whose three run "Shot Heard 'Round the World" won a 1951 playoff, was in the stands.

The Dodgers grabbed a 7-1 lead after six innings to end the suspense.

Barry Bonds, who will probably win the NL Most Valuable Player award, also went hitless in four at-bats. Bonds struck out twice.

drives. After spotting the ball at the 20 for the Minutemen, UMass utilized just four plays and drove the ball 80 yards in 1:50 for their second Touchdown on Ingoglia's spectacular 61 yard score. The Minutemen led after the first quarter 14-0.

During a penalty-filled second quarter, JMU, on its third drive of the quarter, had to settle for a 29 yard field goal by Trey Weis after bringing the ball 81 yards on 10 plays. After a Minutemen drive that led to a punt, Cawley threw another interception right into Rajotte's hands as he returned the ball 26 yards to end the half.

The Minutemen began the second half in the same style as the first as they scored on their first drive. Ingoglia and senior John Johnson drove the ball 51 yards in just 1:40, with Ingoglia scoring on a 6 yard run. Oke then booted the PAT, improving the Minutemen lead 21-3.

On their next two drives, the Minutemen scored both times as they got a 19 yard field goal from Oke and a TD from Ingoglia (with Oke kicking the PAT) to boost their lead to 31-3.

At the end of the third quarter, senior linebacker Mario Perry delivered a crushing blow to Cawley, sacking the JMU QB for a 10-yard loss in the end zone, giving the Minutemen two more points and pushing the score to 33-3 after three quarters.

"JMU allowed us to play our defense," said Perry, "which is hard nosed, run to the ball defense. We knew if we gave [the offense] good field position, they could score for us."

The Dukes scored their only touchdown of the game with just under 11 minutes to play as wide receiver David McLeod caught a 13 yard pass for the final score.

Minutemen rebound to shred James Madison

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Just watching University of Massachusetts football coach Mike Hodges stroll into the pressroom following Saturday's game illustrated the success they achieved against James Madison University.

With a smile from ear to ear, Hodges walked into the room filled with sports writers following the Minutemen's 33-10 victory over the Dukes.

Massachusetts 33

"That's more like it," Hodges said after the Minutemen snapped their two game losing streak.

The only legitimate question upon the conclusion of the game was what the Minutemen (0-2 in Yankee Conference play, 2-2 overall) didn't do right against the Dukes (0-2, 2-3). The 14,207 people that attended the game (the most since 1988 when UMass played Villanova in front of 14,301 people) saw a near flawless football game played by the Minutemen.

"We needed this," said Hodges. "You go 1-3, boy, it's a long climb back. We needed this very badly for our confidence. It's been a tough two weeks. They really played together, and I am proud of them."

Though the Minutemen and the Dukes both play in the Yankee Conference, the game is not a designated league contest. UMass and JMU were scheduled to play before the 1993 conference schedule was completed and decided to retain the game even though the conference set up three other inter-divisional games for both.

Balance was the key to the Minutemen's winning effort. The offense? Sophomore Rene Ingoglia led the way, running for a career high 204 yards on 22 carries.

The defense? Senior free safety Matt Rajotte had three interceptions, all in the first half, and defensive end Brian Corcoran led the pass rush with two sacks.

"We got out coached and outplayed," said JMU head coach Rip Scherer. "They whipped us every way possible."

From the outset, the Minutemen dominated the Dukes both offensively and defensively. On the first drive of the game, after just 55 seconds had gone by, Rajotte picked off JMU quarterback Mike Cawley's second pass of the game and ran 11 yards to the JMU 40 yard line.

Ingoglia, after a 9 yard run, scored his first of four touchdowns as he ran 31 yards for the score. Just 32 seconds elapsed for the Minutemen's first touchdown as they led the Dukes 6-0, after freshmen Eric Oke missed the extra point.

On their very next possession, the Dukes turned the ball over again. After a sack for a loss of eight by defensive tackle Silas Burke, Cawley threw his second interception in a three minute span as Rajotte picked off another pass and returned it 19 yards to the JMU 34 yard line.

The punting crews for both the Minutemen and the Dukes were forced to come out on the next two respective

Minutemen win again at McGuirk

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The day had everything: picture-perfect football weather, a huge contingent of bands, thousands of parents and a good old-fashioned blowout by the home team.

In this case the day was Saturday, the place was Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium and the final was 33-10, with the University of Massachusetts triumphing over James Madison University.

After two disappointing road losses, the Minutemen (2-2, still 0-2 in the Yankee Conference) returned home with a throng of 14,207 fans cheering them on. Many of the players were surprised the support in the stands was there.

"I love it here," said defensive end Brian Corcoran, who had four tackles and two and a half sacks. "That support out there was great. I wasn't expecting any crowd after the last two weeks."

Indian summer and the two big drawing cards of UMass football were out in force: Rene Ingoglia, who is making a habit of topping his career bests every week; and Mario Perry, who had his best performance of the year.

Ingoglia, only a sophomore, had 202 yards on the ground on only 22 carries (9.3 average). He scored four touchdowns, and had touchdown

Women fall to William & Mary

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. — Yesterday was a bad day for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

The Minutewomen (7-2-1) could get little going offensively and lost their captain and sweeper Paula Wilkins to a hamstring injury, in a 2-0 loss to a fine William & Mary team.

The Tribe, 6-2-1 and ranked No. 7 nationally, played a strong defensive game in front of goal keeper Maren Rojas, allowing only few quality UMass scoring attempts and no sustained attack. Offensively, William & Mary capitalized on its opportunities scoring once early and once in the second half to secure the victory.

William & Mary 2, UMass 0

In the 16th minute, William & Mary midfielder Kelcey Becker won a ball on the left wing, 30 yards from the UMass net. She moved toward the center and served a ball to the goalbox, where Marypat Howard was able to head it over UMass goalkeeper Briana Scurry.

"We made a tactical glitch on the first goal," UMass head coach Jim Rudy said. "On the field the players had decided to move a bunch of people around and we got caught short at the wrong time."

UMass, which is unaccustomed to playing while behind, made a few surges in the first but were unable to capitalize as Rojas was tough in the Tribe net.

In the second half, disaster struck when Wilkins, UMass defensive stopper and offensive quarterback, pulled a hamstring during a midfield collision. Rudy was forced to play freshman Erin Lynch, herself just getting over an injury at the sweeper position.

"Wilkins is very critical to our offense and our defense," Rudy said. "We had to change everything around without her in there and that means playing people in positions they are not comfortable with."

Lynch, along with Heidi Kocher, Amy Trunk and Myers, responded admirably in back against a potent Tribe attack.

The Minutewomen's best chance to get a goal back, came in the 70th minute, when Melissa Mitchell took a Colleen Milliken flick, and was in alone on Rojas. Mitchell got a good shot off, but Rojas came up with the key save.

Two minutes later, William & Mary's Ann Cook drove through the center of the UMass box and lofted a hot over a leaping Scurry.

"It's a difficult loss," Rudy said. "We had our chance but we couldn't capitalize. Both goal were nice, they had to beat Scurry."

Wilkins was walking after the game and it is unclear how many, if any, games the senior will miss.

On Saturday UMass outlasted Providence and its talented goal keeper Jen Mead to win 1-0 in overtime.

Rachel LeDuc was able to one-time a Kocher cross to the left of Mead, with 7:13 remaining in overtime.

"I saw Heidi was on the wing and I just yelled for her to send it," LeDuc said. "It came in and I was able to get my left foot on it and put it in."

Scurry outdueled her fellow All-America candidate Mead for the shutout, her sixth of the season.

UMass, 7-2-1, will likely fall out of the Top 10 this week, but can rebound with two, important regional games this week. On Wednesday, the Minutewomen host Yale at 3:30 p.m. and on Saturday, they travel to Hartford, Conn., to face the fourth ranked Hartford Hawks.

Hixon's Minutewomen win, deserve campus spotlight

Ding, dong, the wicked old witch is dead.

Yes, when the final second ticked off the clock at Totman Field at around 1:30 p.m. on Saturday, the 2-0 victory for the University of Massachusetts field hockey signified more than just the dethroning of the dynasty that was Old Dominion University.

SPOTLIGHT
Art Stapleton takes a closer look at UMass Sports

The Lady Monarchs ruled the land of field hockey for three years, but over the last two weekends, ODU ran into a hostile revolution led by Penn State, North Carolina, and Massachusetts.

First came the Nittany Lions, who stole the number one ranking from the three-time defending champions in more ways than one by going into ODU's kingdom and coming away with the crown.

ODU Coach Beth Anders' troops suffered another disheartening blow when they were tied by the Tar Heels, once again on their home turf.

And then there was Saturday. The Minutewomen, hardly packing the Hill at Totman, possibly because of the 14,000 plus that filled Warren McGuirk Stadium simultaneously, pulled off what Coach Pam Hixon called the biggest victory for the program. Ever.

Even more impressive than last season's dramatic win over Penn State at Totman which sent UMass to the Final Four.

The victory for the Minutewomen establishes them as a legitimate threat for the national crown, but for now, the crown that was wrested away on Saturday from the Lady Monarchs is sweet enough.

It was more than a game. It was an event. Chancellor David K. Scott and University President Michael Hooker were in attendence. Actually, the first person to congratulate Hixon was Hooker, who apparently has become an avid fan of the Minutewomen.

While the football team was running up the score against James Madison, both Hooker and Scott took time to attend. This says more for other sports here on campus. Maybe the duo went to McGuirk after the field hockey game. I personally hope they did.

But the fact remains that the most successful team at this University finally got some respect from the higher-ups. They may not bring in television revenue. The names Jelley, Salisbury, and Rothenberger may not be as well-known as Roe, Kellogg, or Camby, but they all deserve their due. Equally.

• Coach Mike Hodges' squad made a statement of their own while the Minutewomen were dominating on the opposite end of the campus.

And for all that is put into Bob Marcum's promise of a Division I-A football program, the crowd that showed up Saturday, no matter what types of fans it was made of, proved that UMass can have a successful

Fraternities sanctioned for brawl

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

After almost three hours of deliberation, debate and discussion, the judicial board of Inter-Fraternity Council came to a decision on the fate of Theta Chi Fraternity and Sigma Phi Epsilon after the two were involved a violent outbreak at Sigma Phi Epsilon, on September 23 during the late hours of the evening.

Due to the "sensitive nature of the material", the Vice President of IFC denied access to the press during the hearing.

According to a statement given by IFC after the hearing, the incident began with two Sigma Phi Epsilon brothers walking down North Pleasant Street and a car of Theta Chi brothers driving by. Due to what IFC described as "miscommunication," words were exchanged, and the driver got out of his car and was struck by one of the pedestrians.

No knowledge of membership in fraternities by either party were acknowledged at this point.

The driver of the car went to his prospective house, and a few brothers from Theta Chi went to another house to find the offender. Although the perpetrator was not found, more heated words were exchanged, and four brothers from Theta Chi went up to the Sigma Phi Epsilon house in Fraternity and Sorority park to possibley find the offender, according to IFC.

Theta Chi president, Kent Sahin was notified of the problem, and went to Sigma Phi Epsilon to break up the matter. He rushed up the Sigma Phi Epsilon along with eleven Theta Chi brothers.

Attempts were made by both presidents and other brothers to prevent violence, but because of verbal outbursts and pushing by both parties, a fight erupted between two men inside the house. Ron Burns, the president of Sigma Phi Epsilon, was struck in the face, according to IFC.

The police promptly responded to calls made by a neighboring sorority, and Sigma Phi Epsilon. The matter was ended upon police arrival.

The hearing was conducted by Executive Vice President of IFC, Joseph Vozza, advisers of Greek Affairs, and a judicial board consisting of one member from every fraternity.

In a decision made by the board, Theta Chi was punished for "un-greek-like behavior", and was cited for trespassing, and violating the property of Sigma Phi Epsilon.

Also, Theta Chi was put on eight weeks of social probation, and must serve a mandatory one thousand

Yeltsin crushes political foes

By DEBORAH SEWARD
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin won a bloody victory in the battle for Russia's future Monday, his tanks and paratroopers flushing his hard line opponents from a flaming Russian parliament building. Scores died as Yeltsin crushed the strongest power bid yet by remnants of the old Communist regime.

The mass surrender of lawmakers and their armed supporters seemed likely to allow Yeltsin to move ahead with plans to elect a new parliament in December, and pursue long frustrated economic reforms. He still faced daunting challenges in his effort to transform Russia's economy and society.

Parliament leaders gave up after 1,000 soldiers raked the white marble parliament relentlessly with fire from T-72 tank cannons and heavy machine guns, but at least some of the holdouts remain at large.

After nightfall, red and green tracer bullets streaked across the sky as flames shot up the sides of the parliament, known as the White House. Armored vehicles and heavy trucks rumbled through the city, and Moscowvites rushed home to beat the new military curfew.

Snipers continued to fire from the White House and surrounding buildings. The search for holdouts was difficult because the 10 story parliament building is an often confusing labyrinth of twisting corridors and hidden rooms.

The storming of the White House broke hard line opposition in the parliament. The attack also made martyrs of his opponents.

President Clinton and other Western leaders were quick to support Yeltsin.

Parliament speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov, Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and other leaders of the two week occupation of the White House were taken from the Parliament to the high-security Lefortovo prison.

Loss of life in Somalia

U.S. forces attacked; at least 14 killed

By SUSANNE M. SCHAFER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon ordered fresh infantry and top-of-the line tanks to Somalia Monday to bolster United States forces after at least 12 Americans were killed, 75 wounded and others feared captured in the fiercest fighting since the mission began.

The casualties, inflicted by the forces of warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid, were the most for the U.S. in such a short period since the Persian Gulf War. The battle began late Sunday and stretched into Monday.

On Capitol Hill, some lawmakers called for a U.S. withdrawal, but President Clinton insisted American forces would remain until order was restored.

Reinforcements were being sent, he said, because, "I'm not satisfied that the folks that are there now have the protection that they need."

At the State Department, spokesman Mike McCurry said the administration remained "firmly committed" to its mission in Somalia, which began last December as a humanitarian venture but took on a more military style as the U.N. became determined to arrest Aidid.

In California, Clinton expressed his condolences for the families of those killed.

"They were working to assure that anarchy and starvation do not return to a nation in which more than 300,000 people had lost their lives, many of them children, before the United States led the United Nations mission there starting last year," he said of the U.S. soldiers. "They were acting in the best spirit of America."

Pentagon officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said "a small number" of troops were feared taken captive in the operation and the U.S. death toll could rise.

They could not verify reports that

Porter admits to molesting 28 Massachusetts children

By JOHN MARCUS
Associated Press

NEW BEDFORD — A former Roman Catholic priest admitted Monday to molesting 28 children at three southeastern Massachusetts parishes in the 1960s in one of the largest child sex abuse cases of its kind.

Prosecutors said 125 people had come forward and were willing to testify that James R. Porter had molested them when they were children. They said several had complained to church officials at the time, without results.

"I hope that every victim of sexual abuse someday in their ordeal can have a day like this," said John Robataille, one of Porter's victims. "From that perspective, it's a good day, but it's a sad day that it ever happened."

When Bristol Superior Court Judge Robert Steadman asked him why he pleaded guilty, Porter, 50, said: "Because I am guilty, your honor."

The former priest was later hustled form the courthouse, surrounded by police, and did not respond to questions

His attorney, Peter DeGelleke, said Porter felt "tremendous guilt."

"He's obviously very nervous. He feels that he's reached a positive decision, a decision that will allow him to proceed with the rest of his life."

But Frank Fitzpatrick, one of Porter's victims who was instrumental in making the case against him, scoffed: "If I were him and I were facing sentencing, I would feel a great deal of remorse and fear perhaps."

One at a time, Porter pleaded guilty to 27 counts of indecent assault and battery on a child under 14, seven counts of unnatural acts on a child under 16, six counts of abominable and detestable crimes against nature and a charge of assault and battery.

He faces a maximum sentence of more than 200 years imprisonment.

Porter remained free on bail. He was scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 6, and prosecutors said they planned to seek "substantial" prison time, and treatment. They also said they would ask that Porter be prohibited from having contact with children other than his own.

The article in Friday's paper about the BOG (10/1) incorrectly stated that the Student Government Association withdrew funding from the Craft Shop. Both organizations increased funding to the center.

In the same issue, the article on false identification quoted Leslie Weinstock, a psychology major, who was not clearly identified.

The Collegian regrets the error.

Late Night promotion a hit for NBC

MATT KAHN/COLLEGIAN
Susan Testa (left) and Patricia Lynn watch in disbelief as their game of Jenga falls.

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

The crowd watched with anticipation as the women removed another tile. Every time the structure wiggled and threatened to fall, the crowd gasped. Sighs of relief could be heard when the piece sat soundly on top.

The Jenga game abruptly ended for three sophomores, Susan Testa, a pre-communications major, Karin Sul, a religion major and Patricia Lin, a psychology major when the wooden pieces smashed on the table.

The scene was not in a nursery or playroom, but rather on the Campus Center Concourse yesterday.

The "Late Night College Tour" is a promotion sponsored by NBC and Milton Bradley Company. Games are provided for anyone to play and commercials for both organizations are played on two televisions at the booth.

The tour here at the University is one of 15 sites for the promotion of late night shows on NBC and Milton Bradley board games.

Chris Russo, Director of Promotions for NBC in New York said both NBC and Milton Bradley were very pleased with the results for the campaign last year and decided to do it again.

The promotion went to 25 colleges last year, but will only be visiting 15 schools this year. Only the schools which were the most receptive to the program will be visited again this year, according to Seth Finman, of MarketSource Corp.

MarketSource Corp., located in Cranbury, N.J., produced the tour, but Russo said NBC and Milton Bradley conceptualized the original idea.

The tour is just one example of NBC's more aggressive promotions of its shows, said Russo.

"NBC and Milton Bradley got together and decided to help each other out," Finman said. "They decided colleges were a great place. And it's something fun for campuses."

NBC is trying to promote its late night shows, particularly the Conan O'Brien show replacing the David Letterman show, Ethan Levine of MarketSource Corpo. said.

"We can make great friends on campus," he said.

Other NBC late night shows preview clips include: Saturday Night Live, the Tonight Show with Jay Leno, Friday Night Videos and Later with Bob Costas.

"Our late night shows are a great demographic mix of what college kids are watching," Russo said.

Games featured from Milton Bradley include: Scattegories, Jenga, Pass the Pigs, Taboo, Oodles, Bandu and Guesstures.

Mark Morriss, the public relations director for Milton Bradley, said the tour, which kicked off at UMass last year, helps expose the games to college students.

Today, University of Massachusetts students living on and off campus will vote in new senators to represent them in the annual Undergraduate Student Senate elections.

Polls will be open from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. and will be located in the Worcester, Franklin, Hampshire, Berkshire Dining Commons, in the Newman Center and the Hatch Cafeteria.

Government Affairs Chairman Cam Tewksbury said the senator's job is to provide a voice for student concerns. Tewksbury was a senator for Pierpont last year.

"Senators are the people that represent you," she said. If you have a problem, they can take the it to the senate floor. We don't promise that things will be changed, but we do promise that the student's problems will be addressed."

Tewksbury also said it is the senator's responsibility to make themselves known to their constituents living in their dorm.

"[How effective senators are] depends on the representative," she said. "The representative has to get himself known, which is not easy to do in a tower, but senators need to go around and ask students if they need help with a problem. The representatives have to have the time and the energy to get to know their constituents. There are people, especially first year students, who have concerns but do not know where to go with them."

Interest in Student Government has increased, which has resulted in more competition for senate elections in the dorms, Tewksbury said.

"Elections vary between dorms, but we are seeing some very competitive races," she said. "There is a good race in Dickenson in Orchard Hill, where that dorm was uncontested last year. This is exciting for us because it forces candidates to do a lot of grass roots politics, to go around and meet their constituents."

Tewksbury said another indication concern for Student Government is on the rise is the heavy voter turnout for elections held in the spring of last year.

Board mulls no tags on beer-balls

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

The future tagging of the now popular beer-balls was discussed during the Amherst Select Board meeting last night at the Bangs Community Center.

During his presentation, Amherst Police Chief Donald N. Maia, recommended to the board that they present a petition at the next Town Meeting to amend section 2.6 of the Keg Licensing By-Law.

This section defines a keg as "any metal, wooden, plastic, paper or other container designed to hold five or more gallons of liquid."

In his letter to the board, Maia wrote the section should instead read, "any metal, wooden, plastic, paper or other container designed to hold five.five (5.5) or more gallons of liquid."

The Chief stated his reasoning for this was the fact a beer-ball only holds about two and one-half cases of beer, or 5.16 gallons, and costs relatively the same amount.

"It would be convenient for the purpose of small gatherings or parties, but the profit margin would not be appropriate for illegally dispensing alcohol for a fee," the Chief wrote in his letter.

Maia said the reason for this move to amend the by-law came about during the annual meeting between the liquor store operators and the Police Department.

Both parties were in agreement in the fact that it would be wasteful for the town to be regulating such purposes.

The Keg Licensing By-Law, added to the Amherst Town By-Laws during a special town meeting last May, gives the Town of Amherst the power to "tag" kegs that are bought in town in order to curb parties where beer was being sold.

During the meeting, the Chief also discussed measures the police are taking this fall concerning alcohol with college students.

After hearing rumors that Amherst college students wee going to other towns to buy kegs, the police decided to take action.

Since the beginning of school, the police have been following cars that are coming from out of town liquor stores in order to see if people are buying illegal kegs. This past Friday, the department issued about $2,500 worth of fines.

The Chief called this "more or less an affirmative education program."

At the meeting, the Town Board took the Chief's recommendation under consideration.

God's role in changing sexual world discussed

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Correspondent

"Does God Belong in the Bedroom," was the topic of a lecture given by Rabbi Michael Gold, last night in the Campus Center, as part of a series presented by the Hillel House entitled, "Judaism and Ethical Issues." Does God Belong in the Bedroom is also the title of Gold's most recent book.

"There is great unrest about what Judaism has to say about sexuality," said Gold in discussing the manner in which sexual practices are examined in the Jewish faith.

In his lecture, Rabbi Gold said sex is a "joyous thing . . . it's something that God wants us to do. It's a way of achieving holiness," and noted that he feels marriages to be the ideal setting in which people should engage in sexual behavior.

"Marriages are the basic building blocks of Judaism," said Gold. "If there's anything that defines a marriage, it's fidelity."

Gold made numerous references to religious texts such as the Bible and the Torah in presenting his views to the audience, noting that in sexual situations people must ask whether they are "Treating each other with a significant amount of dignity and respect," adding that, "The Torah doesn't say a man shall leave his parents and have a series of one night stands."

"The Torah recognizes that sex, with the wrong person, at the wrong time, can destroy," said Gold.

During his lecture Rabbi Gold took questions from the audience pertaining to a variety of issues such as homosexuality and adolescent sexual behavior.

"This is the issue that's dividing the Jewish community in very profound ways today," said Gold in addressing homosexuality.

Gold said he does not advise adolescents to engage in sexual behavior.

"What I tell teenagers is 'keep it above the waist,'" said Gold in discussing the fact that he felt distributing condoms to his youth group would convey an improper message.

Michael Gold is the Rabbi of Temple Beth Torah in Tamarac, Florida.

In addition to writing Does God Belong In The Bedroom, Gold previously authored a book entitled And Hannah Wept; Infertility, Adoption, and the Jewish Couple.

He received a B.A. in Mathematics from the University of California. Gold was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1979.

Rabbi Gold is currently writing a third book which he says will be about "Jewish family values."

Some of Porter's victims, now in their 30s and 40s, sat in the courtroom and cried softly as court officials read the names of one child after another in a litany of Porter's crimes.

"I've done my 30 years and now it's his turn," one, George Hardis, said later.

Porter previously had pleaded innocent, and his attorneys had sought legal mechanisms to evade the charges. Five counts involving four alleged victims were dismissed because they exceeded the statue of limitations.

DeGelleke said, "It is possible to defend 30-year-old allegations. It is impossible to sort out precisely where someone was and what they were doing."

But District Attorney Paul Walsh said, "We had an overwhelming case against Mr. Porter, and that's why had decided to plead guilty."

Among other things, Walsh said, investigators had found evidence that parents of molested children had complained to the church officials, who moved Porter form parish to another in the diocese, but apparently took no other action.

"This is not an indictment of the Catholic Church or of any other church," said Walsh, whose jurisdiction is predominantly Catholic. "I'm not going to venture an opinion on the church's propriety in this matter. I don't think it's something that's within the purview of the district attorney."

But several victims, who have formed a group called Survivor Connections, demanded that the church adopt a policy of immediately investigating any sexual abuse complaints involving clergy; remove the perpetrator if the charges are true; report the complaints to civil authorities; and encourage victims to come forward.

"I don't expect we'll ever get an apology from Father Porter," said Fitzpatrick. "That would do no good whatsoever. I would like an apology from the Church."

"In the elections last spring for president and trustee the voter turnout was great," she said. "I don't know if there was more interest or because of the race, but 23 percent of the student population voted, which is very good. I hope it carries on into this election."

Tewksbury said she hopes more students will get involved with Student Government, both in terms of voting and by offering their services.

"I hope that every student gets out there and votes," she said. "Even if the people who run for senator do not get elected, they can still get involved. All you have to do is call us [at the Student Government Office] and there will be a job for you."

Supreme Court listens to appeal from clerk

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — The lawyer for a court clerk accused of misconduct appealed for leniency Monday during a traveling session of state Supreme Court designed to boost public backing for the justice system.

The accused clerk, Janet Rowe Dugan of Northampton District Court, is accused of verbally abusing subordinates, lawyers and the public; fixing traffic tickets and falsifying court papers; keeping an erratic work schedule and sending staffers on private errands.

The state Supreme Court's Committee on Professional Responsibility for Clerks recommended Aug. 25 that she be removed from her job. She was appointed by Gov. Edward King in 1982.

Her lawyer, James Reardon Sr., said Dugan should only be put on probation and reassigned to another court. He said she would accept sensitivity training.

"It would not be right to appear before this court and say that Janet Rowe Dugan has not committed some errors," her lawyer said. But he added, "She should not be put out to pasture."

He was speaking before the seven Supreme Court justices sitting in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton. As the state's highest judges, they hold the power to decide Dugan's professional fate.

The justices came to Northampton as part of a program to build understanding of the justice system with occasional sessions outside their home in Boston. They also heard several other cases during the one day session in Northampton, their first in the city since 1959.

During the 30-minute Dugan hearing, the opposing lawyer argued that she should be fired as "an utter and total failure."

"While there may be specific acts of misconduct which individually could be considered to be worse or more heinous than those committed by Miss Dugan, it's difficult to imagine a worse clerk in the sense of how that office was conducted under her supervision," said Francis Dibble Jr., the court-assigned special counsel.

District court clerks fulfill a wide variety of duties, including record keeping, scheduling legal cases, issuing criminal complaints, and granting restraining orders.

Some colleagues say Dugan acted unpredictably, used her office to punish people she disliked, and exploded in periodic temper tantrums.

During a May hearing by the Committee on Professional Responsibility, court workers testified that Dugan sometimes screamed at them and told them that they were fired.

One clerk said Dugan told her to "go commit suicide" after an argument.

The committee also found that Dugan "demeaned, yelled at or insulted, or was discourteous, impatient or rude, or acted in an undignified and unprofessional manner" toward judges, lawyers, other people involved in court cases, and the general public.

But admirers say that, while perhaps abrasive, Dugan has shown strong commitment to the work of the courts and helped many colleagues.

Dugan, who left while Monday's hearing was in progress, decline to comment when reached by telephone at home. She has contended in the past that critics with personal grudges were ganging up on her.

The justices did not indicate when they will rule on her case. Meanwhile, she remains suspended but continues to receive her $60,500 annual salary.

parliament on Sept. 21, armed hard liners captured the Moscow mayor's offices and tried to take Russia's main television center Sunday. Parliament leaders urged supporters to topple Yeltsin.

Yeltsin spent the day closeted with his closest aides in the Kremlin, where he had remained overnight since rushing there by helicopter during Sunday's street fighting. Late Monday, he returned to his country dacha.

He struck back just after dawn Monday with the assault on the Parliamentary building.

"All that was and still is going on in Moscow — was an armed revolt planned in advance," Yeltsin said on nationwide television.

"It was organized by Communists seeking revenge, by fascist leaders and some of the former lawmakers . . . . There can be no forgiveness because they lifted their hand against peaceful people," in Sunday's rioting.

Authorities had no firm figures on casualties from the 10-hour battle at the White House, but soldiers stacked dozens of bodies outside the building.

Rey given compensation

Court awards copyright royalties

WASHINGTON (AP) — A contract dispute over monkey business failed to win Supreme Court review today. Instead, the justices left intact a legal victory won by the author of "Curious George" children's books.

The justices, without comment, let stand rulings that said Margret Rey was owed additional copyright royalties for sales of old television show episodes on videocassettes.

"Curious George" is an imaginary and mischievous monkey whose exploits in seven books written by Mrs. Rey and her late husband, H.A. Rey, have entertained generations of children since the 1940s.

In the late 1970s, Mrs. Rey signed two contracts that licensed away the right to depict the popular monkey in animated episodes "for television viewing." Production of 104 episodes was completed in 1983.

In 1991, Mrs. Rey sued over what she alleged were unauthorized uses of her copyright — the sale in videocassette form of the episodes created for television.

A federal trial judge, upheld last March by the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, ruled that Mrs. Rey's granting the right to create the episodes for television viewing did not encompass the right to distribute those episodes in videocassette form.

seven U.S. Army Rangers had been taken hostage by Aidid's forces.

The fighting came as United Nations forces launched a new attempt to destroy Aidid's military command structure in Mogadishu.

The fresh troops will come from the 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized), based in Fort Stewart, Ga.

"We're sending in the heavy armor," said one Pentagon official. The forces were expected to be flown from Hunter Army Airfield near Fort Stewart to Somalia aboard C-5A transport planes.

They will take at least four of the Army's top-of-the line M1 A1 tanks, which will be specially outfitted with plows to detonate mines, and about one dozen Bradley Fighting Vehicles, which are armored troop transports. Such heavy weaponry hasn't been available to the U.S. forces on the ground in Somalia since the Marines left several months ago.

Clinton said the United States must not waver from its commitment to help erase "brutality and anarchy" in the East African country.

"Americans by the dozen are paying with their lives and limbs for a misplaced policy," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va.

And Senate Minority leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said, "It seems to me it's time to take a hard, hard look on why we're still there . . . it's gone from a humanitarian mission to almost an outright armed conflict, and it seems to me Congress and the administration ought to come to grips with this and made a decision one way or another."

In Mogadishu, chief U.N. military spokesman David Stockwell confirmed that some U.S. troops were unaccounted for. He said that if the Americans were being held by the Aidid militia, they should be given food and adequate medical treatment.

Minority programs amount to state sponsored segregation

Gary Trudeau, creator of the comic strip "Doonesbury," hit the nail on the head in his strip, a few Sundays back. A chancellor of a major university is sitting in his office with a representative of the schools minority students.

The representative tells the chancellor that in addition to the separate dorms, fraternities, student center and graduation, that the minorities have received, they are now demanding...their own water fountains.

If things continue to progress in the direction they are going, that campus could be UMass.

Anybody who has spent time on this campus can tell you that the issue of race relations is taken very seriously by the administration of UMass. Instead of providing equal opportunities to everybody, it seems that in an effort to be politically correct and to avoid being accused of racism, the administration relents whenever minority groups put pressure on them.

The Student Activities Office sent out a flyer to students about a week before the start of this semester, welcoming students and announcing the first week events. Listed as an activity was the "Campus B.B.Q. for African-American, Latin-American, Asian-American and Native American students." That covers everybody on this campus except whites. That is discrimination.

Matt VAUTOUR

Nice Welcome.

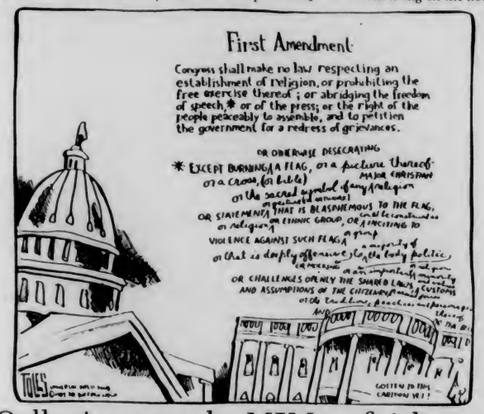
Housing offers several special opportunities for minorities. There are floors all over campus designated to specific minority groups. Why?

Segregation rears its ugly head.

Imagine this scenario: a group of students go to the housing office to request housing with all whites. They would be accused of racism and laughed right out of housing; or if per chance their request were granted, there would be riots. Yet when minority groups request it, housing provides it.

This is the first semester the Native-American floor on the second floor of Chadbourne, was opened. Two days before room choosing last semester, students who had been living on the floor were told that unless they would be willing to sign a waiver stating that they were sympathetic to the plight of Native Americans and would take a three credit course on their culture, they would be forced to live elsewhere.

The administration boasts of its commitment to diversity. Its a farce. State sponsored segregation.



There is no hiding the fact that there are racist whites who discriminate against minorities. That is an issue that needs to be dealt with as well, but nobody, regardless of skin color, hair color, or eye color deserves special priviledges. That will always lead to unnecessary resentment.

When minorities are discriminated against it is a major issue, and very often front page news. When the roles are reversed and the minorities are discriminating against whites, almost nothing is said.

Racism stems from ignorance. Segregating races breeds this ignorance and distrust.

Everybody's tuition/fees pays for these programs, yet only a limited number receive any benefits from them. A public state sponsored university should be color blind.

Collegian attacks MIM unfairly

The Maoist Internationalist Movement (MIM) did not deceive the Office of the Third World Affairs to show The People of the Shining Path. MIM was very clear to the Office of Third World Affairs that MIM is not a registered student group, and that the film was about the revolution in Peru.

If MIM was misunderstood in the regard, then MIM regrets its involvement in this mistake. However, it is the responsibility of the co-sponsors of an event to make sure they know what they are sponsoring. It is not fair to blame MIM for "deception" if an organization didn't pay attention, or didn't investigate the film.

There is no ambiguity about MIM's position on the revolution in Peru. The name of our Movement begins with the word "Maoist," we distribute a newspaper on campus with monthly articles on Peru and poster the campus with flyers headlined "Victory to Maoism in Peru."

Second, some people have claimed that MIM and the video were too one-sided. The pro-peruvian government side is the only side represented in the U.S. media. As revolutionary Maoists we are trying to offer people the other side of the story.

Peru is a country where people are starving and live under military occupation. The Communist party of Peru (The Shining Path) and the Peruvian people are engaged in revolution because armed struggle is the only way they can end their oppression under imperialism. This is what the film was about — "the people and the country of Peru" — contrary to what the Collegian claimed.

The Collegian reporter asked one-sided, pro-peruvian government questions throughout the discussion, did not publicly identify himself as a Collegian reporter, and then wrote a story attacking MIM for one-sidedness and "deception."

The discussion after the movie was open and frank, and was in fact dominated by opponents of the Shining Path, whose participation was welcomed and encouraged by MIM organizers.

MIM does not claim to practice non-partisan journalism or politics; but the Collegian does. Therefore, it is highly hypocritical of the Collegian to launch a partisan attack on MIM and the revolution in Peru, while criticizing our one-sided approach.

Systematic rape of Bosnia

In the former Yugoslavia war crimes have been conducted on a scale not seen in Europe since World War two. War crimes are one of the most difficult aspects of a war. It is always very hard to sift though all of the propaganda and come up with a clear picture of what is going on. It is doubly hard for the victims of war crimes to heal because justice is rarely served.

Brian C. O'NEIL

Ethnic cleansing has been a phrase to sum up the conditions of the war crimes in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Ethnic cleansing means doing anything it takes (i.e. rape, torture, murder) to drive people from their land.

Many victims of this war retell how the soldiers will come into their village and designate a local school or some building to be the rape camp. Local women will be rounded up and kept until they're so brutalized that they can no longer speak. Others are murdered. Some are held until it's too late in their pregnancy to get a legal abortion.

It may be impossible to ever get a clear picture of how many victims of these war crimes there are. Many victims say that if they speak of what is happening the oppressors will come down harder on their loved ones still trapped inside. Other victims are too afraid of telling their families for fear of humiliation.

Most of the victims of this systematic rape have been Bosnian-Muslims and Bosnian-Croat women. Victims range from girls as young as ten to elderly women. Many are raped multiple times for a period of months.

The Bosnian government claims as many as 30 to 50 thousand women have been raped so far, and it is still going on today.

Physicians for Human Rights, a humanitarian organization based in Boston, sent a small team of investigators to Bosnia to get a clearer picture of what is going on. In the areas they visited they documented 119 cases of rape, which they say was likely to have been the result of as many as 12 thousand incidents of rape. Medical studies indicate that for every 100 incidents of rape there is an average of one pregnancy.

It will be very difficult to calculate the actual number of victims until the fighting stops. Although all sides in this conflict have been violating human rights, most of the documented reports point to Bosnian-Serbs as the main violators.

Much of the Bosnian-Serb (Chetnic) reasoning for the atrocities stems from old hatreds. During WWII Serbians were the victims of the Croatian facists, known as the Ustasha. Some reports claim that as many as one half of a million Serbs died during WWII. Some Serbians see the war in the former Yugoslavia as part of and old dream of a greater Serbia, an ethnically pure state.

Reports claim that the Bosnian-Serb leaders have actively promoted rape as a tool of war. It is also rumored that some members of the United Nations Protection forces have participated in some of these sexual abuse cases while visiting the rape camps.

There must be a war crimes tribunal set up following this war. The guilty must pay for what they have done. The arms embargo must be lifted so the people of Bosnia can protect themselves.

Lunch with the Collegian is fun

I know you guys at the Collegian are always getting picked on, but I actually like your newspaper. As far as I am concerned, the Collegian is the best thing to happen to UMass since the chicken puck.

As an undergradutae I rarely find time for watching the news on television or reading city newspapers, such as The Boston Globe. Thus I have to rely on The Collegian to inform me of the days events and I have not been disappointed.

The Collegian is able to blend enough National and International news with local and campus information to keep me up to date with news from around the world and around the Pioneer Valley.

Most importantly though, I can't imagine what I would do at lunch time without the Collegian. Everyday, you are there for me to read, for free, as I sit down to eat. Lunch would be pretty boring without the Collegian. Sometimes you do not print during finals and lunch is no fun. I am forced to read some other lousy valley publication, which just doesn't compare to the Collegian.

Seriously, from news to sports to the daily weather, I can't imagine UMass without the Daily Collegian.

Number of poor increase

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Southern New England, despite its economic slump, enjoys higher income levels and has fewer people living in poverty and without health insurance than most of the rest of the country, the Census Bureau reported Monday.

Nationwide, the number of poor Americans jumped to 36.9 million last year, more than at anytime since John F. Kennedy was president. The figures show 1.2 million Americans were added to the poverty rolls — a fact analysts attributed to lingering unemployment amid a slow recovery from the recession.

Throughout the Northeast the Census Bureau reported a significant decline in median household income of 3.7 percent between 1991 and last year. The region also had the largest median income decline over the period from 1989 through 1992- 10.1 percent. But the Northeast continues to report the lowest poverty rates in the country, as the figures from Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut attest.

Last year, Connecticut had 303,000 people living below the poverty line, or 9.4 percent of the state population. That's only slightly higher than in 1983, a similar year in which Connecticut and the nation were slowly recovering from recession.

Allowing from statistical deviation, Connecticut is in a group of 14 states reporting the lowest poverty levels in the nation.

For a family of four in 1992, the poverty line was $14,335. For someone living alone it was $7,143. The figures in the report are subject to variation because they are based on surveys of population samples rather than a total head-count.

Massachusetts and Rhode Island were in the top third in the nation among states with the lowest poverty levels. In 1992 there were 110,00 Rhode Islanders, or 12 percent of the state population, living below the poverty line.

Massachusetts reported 580,000 people below the poverty line in 1992, or 10 percent. In terms of the recession's impact on the poor, Massachusetts would appear to be lagging its recovery pace of a decade earlier; in 1983 the state reported 7.7 percent of its population below poverty, a sharp improvement over the previous year.

Nevertheless, all three New England states were well below the national average poverty rate of 14.5 percent.

Median household income held steady in Connecticut from 1990 through 1992 at about $41,000, highest in the nation along with Hawaii, Alaska, and New Jersey. Median income also stayed roughly level over the same three years in Massachusetts at about $36,500. Only five states reported higher median incomes.

Rhode Island's median income dropped noticeably from 1990 through 1992, according to the Census study, from $33,313 down to 30,030- slightly below the national average.

But Daniel Weinberg, the Census Bureau official in charge of the poverty numbers, said the income figures left some room for optimism.

"We know, if the poor got poorer, they didn't get much poorer," Weinberg said at a news conference. "After this recession, I suspect you'll see a decline in the poverty rate."

The percentage of the Connecticut's population without health insurance increased from 6.9 percent in 1990 to 8.1 percent last year. But this change was considered "statistically insignificant" by the Census Bureau. In any case, Connecticut was grouped with Hawaii and North Dakota as those with the lowest share of their populations lacking health coverage.

Rhode Island improved its health coverage performance with 9.3 percent lacking coverage last year compared to 11.2 percent in 1990.

"With college students being trendsetters and such, to expose the games to college students helps a lot," Morriss said.

"Research shows that adult games are played mostly by college students and [the tour] is the perfect way to put those games in their hands," he said.

Prizes such as t-shirts are awarded to those who play the games and anyone may enter to win the grand prize, a all expense paid trip for two to Los Angeles or New York for an NBC late night show taping.

"Students like the games and want to play," Finman said, but they are often intimidated by the microphone. "Once they start playing, they do have fun."

The promotion will also be on the concourse from 10 a.m to 6 p.m. on Tuesday.

Tame Wedding Banquet; joyless Club

COURTESY TWENTIETH CENTURY FOX
Tamlyn Tomita co-stars in the new film, "The Joy Luck Club"

THE REEL WORLD
by Jon Lupo

It's easy to overrate Ang Lee's warmly amusing The Wedding Banquet, mainly because you're rooting so hard for it to fly. The plain fact is that it isn't funny enough to be screwball romantic comedy nor probing enough to be the cross-cultural/generational gap drama it strives to be. While far from a terrible film — it's surely worth a look — Banquet turns out to be too nice for its own good.

Wai Tung (Winston Chao) is a handsome Asian businessman involved with an equally handsome physical therapist, Simon (Mitchell Lichtenstein). The pair share an idyllic movie life, except that Wai Tung's parents, still living in Taiwan, desperately want him to marry, not knowing he is gay.

Simon and Wai Tung concoct a plan to enter a marriage of convenience with Wei Wei (May Chin), a struggling painter who needs a green card that lives in one of Wai Tung's buildings. But when Wai Tung's parents travel to New York for the 'wedding,' the trio is forced to conduct an elaborate charade, with Simon acting as Wai Tung's landlord.

The major problem with Banquet is that it looks, feels and acts like a two-hour sitcom pilot. Simon and Wai Tung are a little too perfect, and it's clear even from the opening scenes that everything's going to work out. As for the 'wacky' situations they're placed in, they scream for commercial cliffhangers. Everyone's trying so hard to be likable, that the acting turns out to have little life, with only Litchtenstein (Streamers) making any lasting impact.

Director Lee is trying for some sort of gay nineties update of The Philadelphia Story, with attractive stars, semi-witty dialogue and a redi-made politically correct sheen. Yes, it's about time we had a gay couple who aren't stereotypes, but did they have to be so bland?

Lee does however succeed in showing how much adult children will bend over backwards to fit the model they believe their parents want, and the fact that in the end, it's impossible to hide the truth from our parents because by their very nature, they know everything about us. What they choose to accept is another matter.

And yet Lee keeps throwing softballs at complex issues, opting for an old-fashioned (read: safe) exploration of values. It's this tone that makes Banquet a nice, happy movie, but (frustratingly) nothing more. By the film's impossibly 'bittersweet' conclusion (it's teeming with sitcom possibilities), Banquet has done more to make the characters relatable than real.

Next up is Wayne Wang's relentlessly morose adaptation of Amy Tan's best-seller, The Joy Luck Club. Here's a case where a film is just trying to do too much, choosing pathos overkill as its major theme. While not discounting Club's distinction at being Queen of the Major Tearjerkers, there are are serious structural problems at work here, and no amount of crocodile tears can help.

Club tells of four Chinese women now living in San Francisco, chronicling their own lives and those of their four daughters. The film is told in flashback upon flashback, spanning decades and

UMass life rates high

Most folks are taken aback when twenty-year-old Linda Hellner-Tara tells them where she is from. This half-Indian, half-Swedish woman is often mistaken for Brazilian, but as soon as she starts talking about her homeland and her dark eyes light-up, one cannot confuse her love for Sweden for any other country.

Hellner-Tara is a first-year Political Science major and German/French minor who is studying to receive her Bachelors from UMass. Having heard about UMass two years ago when spending a year on exchange in Westford, Mass., she is half a world away with a four years of opportunity ahead of her.

Half a World Away
By Emily Marino

A resident on the International floor in Northeast's Thatcher, Hellner-Tara has met students from all over the world. She claims that living with other foreigners is helpful in the sense that she and her floormates are looking in on a different culture and often experience the same kinds of things, and share similar reactions or observations.

However, Hellner-Tara is determined to meet and get to know as many Americans as possible, explaining that this is one of the main reasons she came here in the first place.

"If I wanted to hang out with Swedish students, I would have stayed in Sweden," she says.

According to this articulate, friendly woman, getting to know Americans has, thus far, been very easy.

"Everyone greets you here, even if they don't know you," she notes, adding that peers back home tend to stay in tight-knit groups and are not as outgoing to strangers.

With a quickly-expanding group of both American and International friends, Hellner-Tara does not have much time to be homesick. Balancing studying and an active social life ("there are parties here all the time," she

Fox can't save bankrupt Money

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Michael J. Fox has finally grown up. Ever since slumming through Hollywood in a variety of teen roles, Fox has been determined to shed his pre-pubescent screen persona for slightly aged attire, grasping more dramatic roles in films like Casualties of War and Bright Lights, Big City.

Well mixed congratulations are in order. With his latest romantic comedy For Love or Money, Fox has successfully come of age. Unfortunately the vehicle that brought him here is a tricycle.

Money is the "New York Story" of Doug Ireland, a hotel concierge catering to the needs of his ultra-rich clientele. Need passes to Miss Saigon, the Grateful Dead or even a giant stuffed giraffe? Doug can get it. But what he can't seem to grasp is the girl of his dreams (Gabrielle Anwar) or the fulfillment of his lifelong quest to architect his own hotel; both of which lie in the hands of a wealthy investor (Anthony Higgins). Thus Doug must choose, love or money.

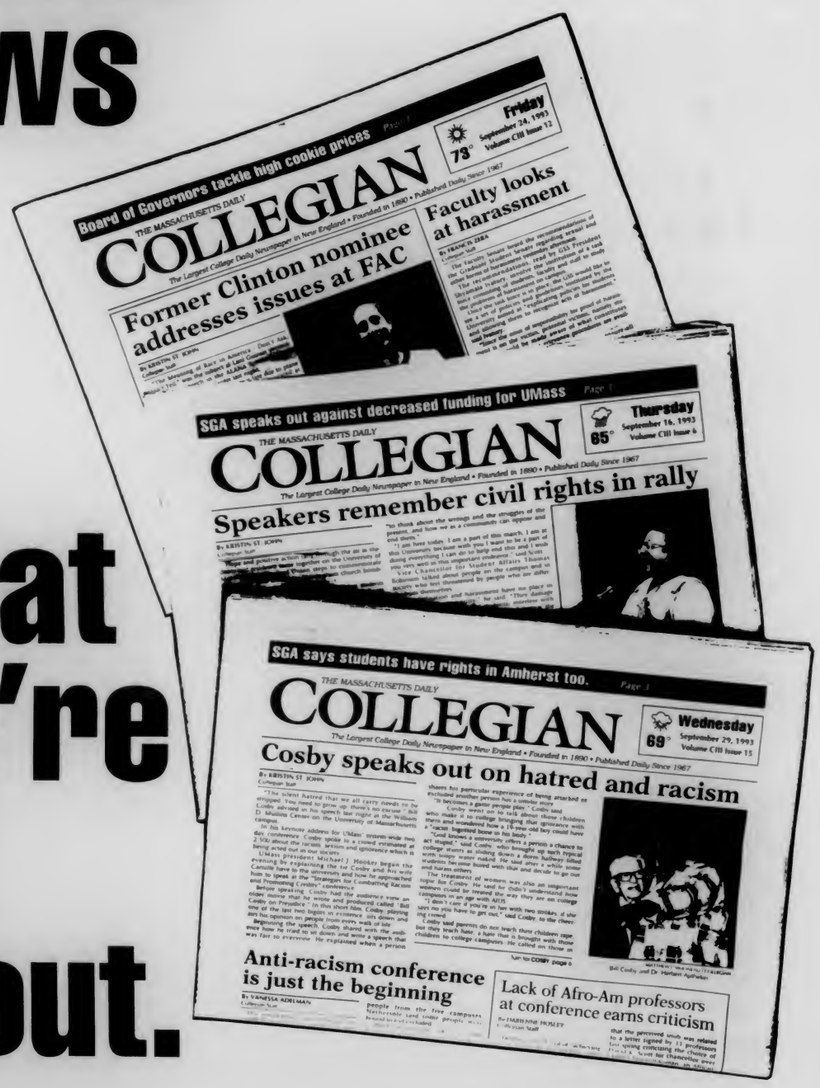
Directed by former cinematographer Barry Sonnenfeld (The Addams Family) the film is a throwback to the screwball romantic comedies of the forties. Unfortunately, it's not thrown far enough. Money misses exactly where those past madcap confections succeeded; in the crisp comedic air between the two romantic leads and the inspired slapstick resultant from their sparks of passion. Nothing ever ignites between Fox and Anwar; he plays it all for the money and she simply plays dumb, both of them patsies for Higgins' desires.

Money does mirror early comedies in its poor portrayal of women. As Sonnenfeld trots out a bevy of fashion models, the female characters exist as either window-dressing (a la Gentlemen Prefer Blondes) or just morons.

It's amazing that the politically correct climate of the nineties should see the conception of another "lady in waiting" character, but that's just what Anwar is. Her Andy is confined to waiting in restaurants for the perennially jilting Higgins or crashing parties at his wife's estate. The only independence the script gives her is a singing career she lusts to establish on her own, but if that's true then why doesn't she dump the shallow but rich Higgins? Simple, the result would be an absence of plot.

Fox fares much better. The closest he's come to truly carrying a picture was his boardroom comedy The Secret of My Success but here he finally seems commanding of his character. It's fun watching him wheel and deal the surrounding hotel guests, managers and fellow concierges.

As a concierge he owns the city, manipulating convenient traffic jams with the Mafia's aid or indulging Anwar with a one shot gig belting the National Anthem at Yankee Stadium. He's always one step ahead of the peripheral characters and he plays off the contradicting personalities of the boisterous Mafioso (Dan Hedaya) and the naive millionaire (Michael Tucker) with tremendous energy. It's a truly surprising performance from a star thought to have left fame "the Hard Way."



Despite the Michael J. Fox showcase, nothing else elevates the film to viewing status. For Love or Money tries to run the romantic comedy avenue but barbaric portrayals of its female characters and cartoonish depictions of the New York locals lend a devastating detour. After all, how many mobsters really carry suspicious looking guitar cases?

With love or money you can choose one or the other. As for viewing this movie, choose another. C continents, as each mother tells of her own private struggle and then the daughters get a chance to tell of their rebellion. Each scene ends in a sobby anticlimax, where each daughter cries and offers some hokey self-help jargon, realizes that her mother was right and then we go through the entire process again.

While each tale save one is engrossing in their own right, screenwriters Tan, Wang and Ronald Bass (Rainman) would've been wise to cut one of the stories. The structure breeds redundancy — by the third and fourth story it becomes a perverse game of 'Guess My Tragic Past' for the mothers and 'What's My Resulting Neuroses?' for the daughters.

Club also has an annoying crutch of using voice-over to tell part of the story. While some set-up is necessary, especially in a film jumping around like this, Club's obvious dependency is violating a basic film rule: show, don't tell. The voice-over is also more confusing than clear, since we're dealing with four stories and eight different voices.

Overuse of voice-over is all the more cloying because the images Wang does create are truly breathtaking: from war-raveged China to a baby bathing, his visuals are intoxicating and heartfelt (more than the script, I'm afraid).

It also helps that there is some sterling acting in Club. Each actress gives her all, which is sometimes more than necessary, but entirely understandable. Tsai Chin is the best of the mothers, creating a intricate character, and even though she and her daughter (played excellently by Tamlyn Tomita) get their big Cry and Make Up scene, you get the sense that the emotional issues are far from resolved. But as far as the film is concerned, it's time to move on.

While no one can doubt the astounding importance of this film — full-bodied Asian characters, never mind Asian women characters are a scarce sight in movieland — it's a shame Club's structure is mired in manipulative misery. While these stories needed to be told, they need a better storyteller. The Wedding Banquet: B- The Joy Luck Club: C+ exclaims,) she occasionally misses her friends and stuffed animals from home.

"It is nice to always have someone to rely on, you know, like a very, very best friend," she reflects, adding that Americans, while friendly, do not seem as commitment-oriented as her peers in Sweden.

"Americans are more individualistic, I've found." Hellner-Tara adds that students tend to hang-out with many different groups of people rather than with the same few pals. "This is not strange or bad, just different," she concludes.

Despite stereotypes that promote images of nude beaches, a homogeneous, blond population, a strict diet of Swedish meatballs cooked by someone resembling Jim Henson's Swedish Chef, Hellner-Tara does not hesitate to boast of her beautiful country to Americans who may have never even travelled out of this country.

"We have a very beautiful landscape," she smiles. She then goes on to tell of a Midsummer Celebration, an annual festival held the one night of the year that the sun is up all night. An outdoor party with singing, feasting and dancing around the Midsummer Pole commemorates this special event.

Proclaiming her time in America as a welcome change and opportunity to learn about herself and the world, Hellner-Tara feels that it is important for all of us to travel and see other parts of the world.

At times, frustration sets in, especially when Hellner-Tara realizes just how little some Americans know about the rest of the world.

"Is Denmark the capital of Sweden?" is one such discouraging question that she often hears.

Hellner-Tara also finds that most Americans underestimate the value of learning foreign languages.

"Once you know another language, you can go anywhere, do anything," she asserts.

Well, with her sights set high on experiencing America first-rate, with the help of a large group of friends and a driving ambition to learn, Hellner-Tara is sure to fulfill her own philosophy.

"And that," she is convinced, "is an experience everyone could use."

Toddler found alive in rubble

By VIJAY JOSHI
Associated Press

KILLARI, India — Soldiers digging for the body of a toddler in the rubble of her home found her alive Monday, four days after she was buried by the earthquake that leveled her village.

Eighteen-month-old Priyanka Javalga was found under a cot buried by heavy stones from the house that crashed down around her. The frail, wide-eyed little girl was conscious but dehydrated.

"By all logical thinking, she should have died," said Lt. Col. Anuj Kumar Chosh, an army doctor who treated her. "It is nothing but a miracle."

Unofficial estimates of the death toll from Thursday's earthquake in southwest India range as high as 30,000. Authorities say they have identified 10,000 victims so far.

"We do not have a final figure yet," Prime Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao said Monday, after touring earthquake-stricken villages. "I hope to God it is not what is being reported."

The earthquake destroyed all but a few buildings in Manglur, the village where Priyanka's family lived. Her parents escaped with cuts and bruises.

On the night of the quake, Priyanka was lying on the floor, and apparently rolled under the cot where her parents were sleeping.

She was trapped there until her father, Venkat Jawalge, returned to the village from the hospital on Monday. The 30-year-old farmer asked soldiers to help him look for his daughter's body in the wreckage of his home.

"I didn't know whether to believe it or not when the soldiers said Priyanka is alive," he said.

Troops rushed Priyanka to an army infirmary in Killari, five miles away, where doctors gave her oxygen.

"We felt great," said Lt. Col. Vinod Aurora, after pronouncing the toddler in stable condition. "It is a once in a lifetime experience. We may never see such a miracle in our careers again."

Javalge, his eyes brimming with tears, clutched Priyanka to his chest and mumbled, "Thank you, Doctor Sahib," as an army jeep carried father and daughter to a hospital for further care.

Three babies were found alive amid wreckage on Saturday, two days after the earthquake.

Prime Minister Rao toured the quake region Monday and was besieged by survivors demanding new houses.

"Please make arrangements for our housing," said Nirnaly Bhosle, who lost his brother and sister-in-law in the earthquake. "We are all sleeping in the open now."

Rao told a news conference. "We have to rebuild entire villages. . . and give people houses better than the ones they lived in."

Officials began counting survivors to try to determine how many people actually died in the earthquake, India's worst in 50 years.

Early estimates of the death toll have been based in part on reports by village leaders of the number of people missing and presumed buried. But many of those people may have fled the area in panic.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A personal decision cannot be postponed. Take time off from work and get things settled. You will have the advantage if you keep your emotions under control and act quickly.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Sharing your specialized knowledge invites favor. New opportunities arise when VIPs and colleagues gain a better understanding of what you do. Be tactful if asked your opinion.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You have learned from your experiences and should be less vulnerable in a new relationship. Until you find true satisfaction in your work, you will not enjoy the success you deserve.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A good day to take charge of a major project. Use gentle persuasion to win over those whose permission you need. Cross boundaries slowly to avoid resistance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Smooth a bumpy ride with close attention to detail, timing and judgment. An important proposal requires a special presentation. Curb an urge to make waves in romance.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Rash words will be difficult to take back. Make sure a source is reliable before coming down hard on someone. Compromise is the best way to go when dealing with difficult people.

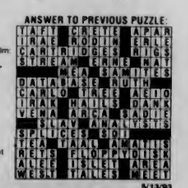
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Team efforts are favored. Your co-workers show you new respect. Share the limelight with those who have helped you. A delightful platonic relationship takes your mind off any romantic worries.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A financial situation will not improve until you limit spending. Creative ideas are the key to greater career success and personal freedom.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Develop a latent talent and you will make important financial gains. An older person plays a major role in a business or personal triumph. Loyalty counts big with members of the opposite sex and pets.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Unexpected news or a delay means you must collect your wits quickly. Sticking to the tried-and-true produces the best results. Make imagination a major part of your creative repertoire.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): An inquiry from someone at a distance leads to a new understanding between you and your associates. Renting a movie may hold more appeal than going out tonight.



PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The cloudy residue of yesterday's quarrels may still linger. You can reduce your chances of making a financial mistake by putting logic ahead of emotion.

they get picked every year. Canucks are solid, and boast youngsters Pavel Bure and Trevor Linden. Kirk McLean backstops a team that can play with anyone. Question: where is Petr Nedved?

2. LA Kings — Stanley Cup run was a fluke, but this division has little else to offer. Gretzky headlines a show featuring Tomas Sandstrom and Luc Robitaille, but Kelly Hrudey not the answer in goal.

3. Calgary Flames — Lots of size, and some scoring ability from mighty-mite Theo Fleury and Joe Nieuwendyk, but team is in desperate need of new blood, especially in goal where whipping boy Mike Vernon resides.

4. Edmonton Oilers — Or is that the Hamilton Oilers? The NHL's San Diego Padres have let everyone go in a three-year fire sale. Expect this team to move very soon.

5. San Jose Sharks — Team that had impressive first year took major step backward last year. If first round pick Viktor Kozlov signs, they will have no problems bettering their 24-point total from last year.

6. Anaheim Mighty Ducks — While I cringe at saying the name, I have no problem picking them last because they have very little talent. Saving grace is goalie Ron Tugnutt, who has the best name in the league.

WEST WINNER: Toronto. Defense and goaltending will do it.

of television sets and viewers.

Toronto, being in Canada, isn't even rated by the Nielsen folks, so it doesn't matter if every man, woman and canuck watch the game. It won't increase the ratings, and subsequently, the advertising revenue.

Having said that, let us look at the two teams, even though I do not think either one has a chance of winning the Series.

Chicago has the edge in pitching, with probable Cy Young winner Jack McDowell leading the staff in wins with 22 and having an earned run average under 3.40. For that matter, Wilson Alvarez was second in the league with a 2.95 ERA, Alex Fernandez was close behind at 3.13 and 169 strikeouts and Jason Bere finished at 12-5 with seven wins in a row.

Now about the closer: I've seen Eck, I've seen the Quiz in his prime, but what I saw of Roberto Hernandez one night at Fenway Park was amazing. He blew away the Sox like no closer I've ever seen.

The lineup is great: Frank Thomas is the MVP, Ventura has sacrificed his average for power, and Ellis Burks and Bo Jackson are two pleasant surprises.

Toronto's offense is spectacular, and the edge obviously goes to them. John Olerud, Devon White, Rickey Henderson, Joe Carter, Paul Molitor and Roberto Alomar are the best lineup I've ever seen.

However, the pitching staff is very suspect, with only Duane Ward, with 45 saves, having an outstanding year. Pat Hentgen should not be the stopper on a team with Juan Guzman, Dave Stewart and Jack Morris. That is the reason why Toronto will fall.

My prediction is that it will take seven games because of Chicago's youth. I wouldn't be too shocked if the Jays slid in cheaply (not unlike the Braves did last year) but look for the CBS TV execs to be very happy.

National League Championship Series.

What can you say about these two except they are almost completely opposite. The Philadelphia Phillies are a bunch of goofballs. The Braves are consummate professionals.

The Phils are a collection of rag-tag personalities and retreads you wouldn't want at Anderson Tire. Atlanta has compiled the best talent money and a farm system could provide.

The Braves have the best record in baseball, while Philadelphia has the home field advantage. The Phillies will go with a three-man rotation of Tommy Greene, Curt Schilling and Terry Mulholland, while Atlanta will use a four-man rotation of Steve Avery, Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine and John Smoltz.

Needless to say, both teams are more than ready to go after a grueling regular season. I'll tell you this: if the Phils lose Game 1 tomorrow night, expect the Philadelphia press and fans to completely give up on them.

You've read enough about the two teams, Braves in four.

I think the Braves have been on a mission since the trade for Fred McGriff and the third time is the charm. The Braves will finally win the World Series, in four straight games.

Athlete of the Week: Melissa Langevin

By JONATHAN GANGI
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts cross country runner Melissa Langevin of Sturbridge, Mass., hasn't yet completed a month of college. She hasn't even been out to a party.

What the freshman exercise science major has done, however, is collect three Atlantic 10 Freshman of the Week awards in her first three weeks of competition.

Coming off her best track season at Tantasqua Regional High, and a second place finish in the Massachusetts State Finals of the two mile, Langevin said she was "psyched" to begin her career at UMass.

Unfortunately, tendonitis started to bother her knee early in the summer, substantially affecting her daily workouts. Langevin admitted that not being in the best shape possible made her a bit nervous entering the season.

But it seems the rest has done her well. In her first collegiate meet, an invitational at Central Connecticut, Langevin placed fifth in a field of 97. She was also the first UMass runner to cross the line.

It was certainly a pleasant surprise to Langevin, who said she "didn't expect anything" going into the race.

Langevin sailed to second place finishes in the next two conference meets, leading her team to victory each time.

Believe it or not, Langevin did not run cross country until her junior year of high school. Her sister Aimee, who is a year younger, was having tremendous success in her first year of track, so Melissa decided to join her.

The two became training partners, setting school records and taking their team to the Border League Championship. When it was time for Melissa to move on, UMass was her first and only choice.

Langevin also said she feels that the team has the potential to make it to the Nationals, something it just missed achieving last fall, this year and in the years to come.

Referring to the abundance of freshmen talent on the squad, Langevin said, "We'll be together for four years and that's a great thing."

With a world of natural talent and a Puritanical work-ethic, there is no limit to Langevin's success. And with four years still remaining for the freshman, the A-10 is in for some excitement.

Minutewomen to face Huskies

By DAVE COPELAND
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team fell to 2-4 after dropping a close match to the University of Hartford on Saturday. The loss makes today's match against a tough University of Connecticut squad that much more important if the team expects to finish the season with a winning record.

Saturday's loss came as a result of off days by the team's singles players.

Liesl Sitton was the lone singles winner for the Minutewomen, posting a 6-0, 6-2 victory. Coach Judy Dixon commented on Sitton's improvement over the past week.

Losses by Liz Durant at number two and by Lesley Watts at number five put the team in a hole that they could not climb out of.

"Lesley had one of those off days that every tennis player dreads," Dixon said. "She was clearly much better than her opponent, but couldn't seem to hold her own out there." Watts lost her match 6-2, 7-5.

Losing so many singles matches forced the Minutewomen into a position where they had to win all three of the doubles matches. They almost pulled it off, but fell short when they lost the afternoon's last doubles match.

Today's match against the Huskies could wind up being the toughest of the season.

"We can't get disheartened by [Saturday's] loss," Dixon said. Dixon added that for her team to pull off an upset today, everyone has to "play better than they've played all season long."

Today's match is a home match which starts at 3:00 PM at the Boyden Courts. Dixon said that she hoped to see a lot of people out showing their support for the team.

After today's match, the team has two more, including another home match against the Dartmouth JV team next Thursday. The team concludes its season with three tournaments later on this month.

Polo breezes in easy weekend

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts water polo head coach Russ Yarworth has a luxury that coaches crave for.

Depth.

And as we all know, when one has a luxury (Shaquille O'Neal in the paint perhaps), it is usually utilized to the fullest.

UMass 14, St. Francis 4
UMass 19, Queens 7

With about half of his team traveling to MIT, Yarworth was able to see some players perform that haven't logged the coveted prime time minutes. Although the cast of characters was quite different, the result was much of the same: two UMass victories.

The first was a 14-4 thumping of St. Francis, while the second was a 19-7 whipping of Queens.

"I took my younger kids and a couple of starters, and went down there and showed them I had the confidence in their development as players to do the job," said Yarworth. "We dominated the games. The defense was tremendous."

That team defense was led by the starting unit of Tasan Engin, Luke Harlan, Ron Gonen, Gary Spremullo, Steve Johnson and Dumrul Alcici. Coming off the bench and providing solid efforts were Greg Gilman and Bob Colettl.

Paul Engin, brother of high scoring two-meter man Tasan, stood tall in goal for UMass (9-3).

"He responded well," said Yarworth. "He had 12 saves against Queens and they threw some heat. They're a good shooting team."

The St. Francis contest saw the scoring spread over seven players. Spremullo, one of three players to tally three goals in the game, looked sharp.

"He's probably the most talented freshman we have as far as raw skill," noted Yarworth. "He's improving in leaps and bounds. Every time he made a mistake, he didn't do it again, and that's the sign of great potential."

The pesky Gonen (three goals), who plays a Muggsy Bogues-like style, also drew raves.

"He was a team leader this weekend," said Yarworth. "He's a sneaky little player, steals the ball when you're not concentrating."

While it was the younger players time to shine, veterans Tasan Engin and Harlan continued to do what they've done all year, playing fundamentally sound polo.

Engin piled up 11 goals over the two-game set, while Harlan added three.

"I probably had more fun coaching than I have had all year," said Yarworth. "It's just a very good experience for everyone involved, a nice display of polo."

Pennant fever leads to Braves and Sox for title

In 1991, the Los Angeles Dodgers were on the verge of winning their second National League West title in four years when they travelled to San Francisco to wrap up the regular season and clinch the playoff berth.

It never happened. The Giants stomped, tromped and romped over Los Angeles while Atlanta was finishing up their Cinderella "Worst to First" season in the East.

The Dodgers never forgot or forgave San Fran, and this past weekend, it was the Giants who headed to Chavez Ravine for a three-game set.

"When they beat us in 1991, their fans were dancing in the streets and their team was 50 games out!" snorted LA manager Tommy Lasorda. "You'll never see my team do that."

Michael Morrissey's BEANBALLS

Nope, all the Dodgers did Sunday was ensure Atlanta's third straight NL West crown by mutilating the Giants 12-1. Meanwhile, everybody else's MVP, Barry Bonds, was 0-4 with two strikeouts.

One last note: those few readers who read the first Beanballs column may have noticed my warning to SF manager Dusty Baker: Solomon Torres is not your savior!

Starting pitching is what finally killed the Giants, even though it took until the last day of the regular season. Starting pitching is why the Atlanta Braves are my pick to win the World Series, and this writer would not be surprised if they ran the table, that is, won eight straight.

American League Championship Series.

This is a chance for the Second City, Chicago, to be first in something other than basketball. And don't think for one moment that CBS isn't rooting for them.

Having the White Sox win would be an incredible potential ratings boost, while having Toronto in the World Series offers them nothing. Why? Read closely.

Chicago is the third largest city in the United States, meaning it has the third-largest amount

Maple Leafs to outclass, stonewall NHL West

If one word could sum up the 1993-94 NHL season it would be change. The league had a very busy summer, highlighted by the addition of two new teams, the introduction of a new playoff format, and divisional realignment.

The Florida Panthers and the Anaheim Mighty Ducks play their first games this year. Florida is owned by Blockbuster Video guru Wayne Huizenga while the Mighty Ducks, who shirked all hockey tradition by choosing such a nickname, are owned by the Disney folks (no, you won't see Pluto lighting the lamp for the Ducks).

BETWEEN THE PIPES
Mike DiLorenzo on the NHL

The new playoff format will feature the top eight teams in each conference qualifying for the post-season.

The NHL also saw it fit to realign and rename the divisions. The conference names were changed to East (Wales Conference) and West (Campbell Conference), and the divisions were changed to Atlantic (Patrick), Northeast (Adams), Pacific (Smythe), and Central (Norris). Teams were then placed in the most geographically fitting division.

So, without further adieu, I give you my picks for the Western Conference in this, the NHL's 77th season:

CENTRAL DIVISION

1. Detroit Red Wings — New coach Scotty Bowman may be perfect man for the Wings, who have loads of talent, but cannot get it done come playoff time. Steve Yzerman heads a good crop of forwards, but the big question is in goal where Tim Cheveldae is on the hot seat.

2. Toronto Maple Leafs — After a run to Cup semi-finals, Leafs polsed to give Detroit a run. Hard-line coach Pat Burns' defensive style will keep them in most games, as will goaltender Felix Potvin. Big question is if Dave Andreychuk and Don Cherry-favorite Doug Gilmour can repeat their performances of last year.

3. Chicago Blackhawks — Any team that gets swept (can you say Buffalo, Bruins fans?) by the St. Louis Blues can't be all that good and Chicago isn't. Despite Jeremy Roenick, the Hawks are goal-starved. Chris Chellos shores up the blue line and Ed Belfour is a stalwart in net, though don't be surprised if he is a NY Ranger by season's end.

4. Winnipeg Jets — Europe West is a more apt name for this team. Jets boast snipers Teemu Selanne and Alexei Zhamnov, but toughness is the problem here. Cam Neely-prototype Keith Tkachuk is a start, but after that it drops off to Tie Domi.

5. St. Louis Blues — Added Phil Housley to an already talented offensive team that features Brett Hull, Brendan Shanahan, and Craig Janney, but the big problem will be keeping pucks out of the net. Don't count on them doing it.

6. Dallas Stars — This team vacated hockey-hotbed Minnesota for the warm confines of Dallas. Will it translate into success? Not likely. Mike Modano is a terrific player, but he doesn't have much help. Stars need big seasons from Derian Hatcher and Andy Moog.

PACIFIC DIVISION

1. Vancouver Canucks — If for no other reason than

Russian ruler ousts three, stays on top

By THOMAS GINSBERG
Associated Press

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin strengthened his victory over hard line enemies Tuesday, sacking three officials even as tanks rolled back from Russia's smoldering Parliament and soldiers searched for more dead.

Sniper fire from the blackened parliament building died down during the day Tuesday. Russian television said authorities suspected some 10 gunmen remained in the 19-story building, known as the White House.

The government assigned lawyers to the leaders of the rebellion former vice president Aleander Rutskoi and parliament speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov. Officials were considering what charges would be filed against them, as they sat behind bars with their followers.

Yeltsin on Tuesday dismissed Russia's chief prosecutor Valentin Stepankov.

Yeltsin also fired two provincial leaders who had opposed him during the crisis.

The cabinet, led by Defense Minister Pavel Grachev, formally thanked some 1300 soldiers and commandos who had pummeled the marble parliament building for 10 hours Monday, igniting fires that blackened the top third of the so called White House. An odor of smoke still hung over parts of Moscow.

"A wave of hatred and death was stopped in Moscow. The bloody rebellion was suppressed," the cabinet said in a statement. "The seeds of a political split in Russia have been uprooted. Now, creative work is needed."

Yeltsin's "creative work" could include living up to promises to improve the economy, holding elections and convicting the parliament leaders who defied and sought for more than a year to hinder him.

Yeltsin is beholden to those who have helped him, notably the military and Russia's 89 regions and republics, most of which backed him in the crisis.

Hundreds rallied in St. Petersburg to support a Russian nationalist TV commentator whose program was cancelled Tuesday. "Yeltsin is a murderer!" the crowd chanted.

The violence grew out of Yeltsin's effort to halt parliamentary instransigence by dissolving the body on Sept. 21. Hard-liners barricaded themselves inside for nearly two weeks, until their supporters' riots prompted Yeltsin to attack the parliament building.

Media reports said at least 300 people were killed during two days of fighting at the White House and the national broadcasting complex in Moscow, according to media reports. Moscow's chief medical administrator confirmed that only 108 had been killed, but added the figure would rise.

"Moscow has never before seen such bloodshed," said the administrator, Anatoly Solvyov.

Other officials said 506 people were wounded since Sunday, when hard line supporters rampaged through the capital.

Clinton sends a harsh warning

More American reinforcements take off for Somalia

By DONNA CASSATA
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — American reinforcements headed to Somalia today as President Clinton warned of swift retaliation if captured U.S. servicemen are harmed and Congress debated whether it was time for the White House to end the mission.

Infantrymen and heavy Army armor left a Georgia base to begin the trip to Africa, sent to bolster U.S. forces that suffered 12 deaths and 78 injuries in weekend battles with forces loyal to Somali warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid. The Pentagon declined to comment on reports that up to eight Americans were being held. One was shown on a videotape being interrogated by his captors.

Meanwhile, Pentagon sources said the total number of U.S. soldiers being sent to Somalia would number about 650. That includes 200 replacement troops, a mechanized infantry company of at least 200 men, and the remainder make up crews for the helicopters and AC-130 gunships and support personnel.

With the heavy armor en route, Army Maj. David Stockwell, the United Nations military spokesman, said American forces would be better equipped to evacuate soldiers after skirmishes with Aidid's supporters.

Clinton planned to meet later today in the White House with his top national security advisers to discuss the crises in Somalia and Russia. White House Communications Director Mike Gearan said Clinton was returning early from his three-day trip to California for the session.

Clinton's decision to send in reinforcements was an influential endorsement today in Congress, but many other lawmakers joined the chorus urging the president to order American forces home.

Republican Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, a leading member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, echoed Clinton in saying additional troops were "imperative for the safety of those that are there now."

"There are things that can be done to make things safer while we debate the policy," Lugar said on Fox television. Sen. Sam Nunn of Georgia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, also said the deployment was necessary to protect American troops while the overall policy is debated.

But another Senate Republican, John McCain of Arizona, said the humanitarian mission to feed starving Somalis and the more difficult job of restoring political order should be left in United Nations' hands.

The United Nations said today it was seeking the release of the captured Americans. On Monday, Clinton warned of "appropriate retaliation if the captured Americans are mistreated," and said it was not time to end the deployment he inherited from the Bush administration.

Michael Jordan to announce retirement from basketball

NEW YORK (AP) — Michael Jordan, the world's most famous athlete and basketball's greatest player, will announce his retirement today, according to NBC and published reports.

"Dateline NBC," the Denver Post and the Chicago Sun Times reported the news almost simultaneously Tuesday night.

Jordan, NBA scoring champion the last seven years, leader of the three-time champion Chicago Bulls and two-time Olympic gold medal winner, is expected to cite his father's slaying this summer as the reason for his retirement at age 30.

"It's time to move on to something else," the Sun Times quoted Jordan as saying. "I know a lot of people are going to be shocked by this decision and probably won't understand. But I've talked it over with my family and friends, and most of all I'm at peace with myself over the decision."

His father's death reportedly robbed Jordan of his desire to play, the Post said.

The Bulls have scheduled a news conference at 11 a.m. EDT today to make what they call a major announcement.

Jordan threw out the ceremonial first pitch at Tuesday night's baseball playoff opener between the Chicago White Sox and the Toronto Blue Jays at Comiskey Park in Chicago. He left after the seventh inning, got behind the wheel of a Mercedez-Benz and drove off.

Jerry Reinsdorf, owner of the White Sox and Bulls, said from the ballpark: "I have nothing to say tonight. We'll have something to say [Wednesday]."

Energy Department told to be on bomb test alert

By ROBERT BURNS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton ordered the Energy Department on Tuesday to prepare for a possible resumption of nuclear testing, acting just hours after China detonated a nuclear bomb and shattered hopes for a global test moratorium.

U.S. analysts and some members of Congress said they interpreted Clinton's response as a diplomatic jab at China and a cautious way of keeping a U.S. test-resumption option alive rather than reflecting an intent to order a test anytime soon.

"This is a positive approach he is taking," said Rep. Mike Kopetski. "I think the president is showing restraint because he knows that just because China is acting like a rogue nation doesn't mean we should, too."

Hours after its underground nuclear blast, China issued a statement saying its nuclear weapons are for self defense and reiterating that it would join in talks starting in January to ban all nuclear weapons tests by Dec., 1996.

A White House statement said Clinton had ordered the Energy Department to "take such actions as are needed to put the U.S. in a position to be able to conduct nuclear tests next year."

It said Clinton had not decided to actually resume testing.

Repeated calls to the Energy Department seeking further details went unanswered Tuesday.

The last known tests were in September 1992 by the U.S. and China.

Women left out in AIDS tests and research

By NICOLE BURKE
Collegian Staff

Women have long been forgotten in the battle to find a cure for AIDS, according to a lecturer at Smith College Tuesday night.

Gina Corea, investigative reporter and author of The Invisible Epidemic: Women and AIDS, was in Wright Hall to discuss the critical issues surrounding women and AIDS.

"The first major fact of the AIDS crisis," she said, "is that we as women have been ignored."

Corea said there have not been enough adequate studies done for women who have come in contact with the HIV virus. She said the lack in studies on women will mean no knowledge of how this disease will develop in women.

"If we gather information on what may be showing up as early symptoms on women with AIDS, doctors can start to prevent it," Corea said.

If you don't gather studies about women's symptoms on this disease, this data is never known. This leads to a failure to diagnose women and also to an underestimation of how many women actually are HIV positive.

Corea said the standard human body in the medical field is a male body. Most studies concerning AIDS are done using experimental drugs on a man's body even though a man's body is significantly different than a woman's body. These studies will not be able to relate to both genders.

"If you don't gather studies about women's symptoms on this disease," Corea said, "this data is never known. This leads to a failure to diagnose women and also to an underestimation of how many women actually are HIV positive."

Corea said because women are usually diagnosed with the HIV disease long after they have actually been infected, their expected life span is significantly shorter than the expected life span of a man who was diagnosed earlier on.

A man's expected life span after diagnosis is twenty-four to thirty-six months while a woman's expected life span is just fifteen weeks to six months.

"The unique manifestation of AIDS in women was not being caught early enough by doctors," Corea said. "From the moment that we knew that AIDS was a sexually transmitted disease, we knew it would affect women."

Corea believes if doctors get more information, do more studies on women with the HIV virus and make this information availible, that women will feel they have more control over the disease.

"Doctors need to examine and listen to women more," Corea said. "The medical profession needs to do more studies because right now they have a lack of hard data concerning the issue."

Corea believes there are not enough services available to women who are HIV positive. She said more than condoms are needed to save women.

"Women don't use condoms," Corea said, "Women have to persuade someone else to use condoms."

Corea said that seventy-one percent of HIV positive women worldwide were infected heterosexually. By the year 2000, that number is expected to rise to ninety percent.

University is preparing for flu

Health Services to offer students immunizations

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

Are you sick of being sick with the flu every winter? University Health Services will be offering a cure.

Volunteers from UHS will be in the Campus Center on Oct. 18 through Nov. 12 giving free flu immunization vaccines to students, faculty and staff.

"Schools are a pool for transmission of the flu," said UHS public health nurse Anne J. Lardner. "Group housing and closed windows in large classrooms are contributors."

The Center for Disease Control has made new recommendations that the flu vaccine is important for people who are likely to spread the disease. One of these groups, said the CDC, is college students who live in dormitories and other people who live in group settings.

Sources said the flu vaccines will also be available at specific dates and times in the lobbies of the dining commons and in the athletic department.

According to UHS sources, because of the CDC recommendations and the large case of flu victims last year, the University approached the Massachusetts Department of Public Health with the possibility of giving the flu vaccine to students.

"We want a cohort of people who are immune to the flu to cut down on the spread of the disease," Lardner said.

According to Lardner, the vaccine is an injection in the upper arm and feels barely like a pinprick. Some students may feel a little tenderness at the site of the vaccine but Lardner said this happens to less than one third of people.

"You don't even need a band-aid," she said.

The flu vaccine takes three weeks to become effective, and Lardner said lasts for a period of three to four months. It helps to avoid the flu and the complications that come with it. One of the most serious complications is pneumonia.

"It would benefit students because they would avoid the disruption that comes with the flu in their lives," said Lardner. "Students who don't get sick don't have to miss classes, exams or papers."

Students going to receive the vaccine must sign a consent form which explains what influenza is, who should get a vaccine and what the vaccine and its dosage as well as possible side effects are. The pamphlet says that most people have no side effects.

"The flu vaccine can be beneficial to everyone," Lardner said.

According to sources, the viruses that cause the flu frequently change, so the people who have been given a flu shot in previous years may become infected with a new one.

For this reason, it is necessary to get a flu vaccine every year. Lardner said the Massachusetts Department of Public Health changes the flu vaccine in accordance with the changes in the flu virus.

According to Lardner, the flu is different from just the average cold. She said characteristics of the flu include a high fever lasting three to four days, severe aches and pains, a prominent headache, and extreme fatigue and weakness lasting up to three weeks.

Lardner said the flu can result in bronchitis and pneumonia and can becone life-threatening. A cold can lead to sinus congestion or an earache.

Lardner said in a cold these symptoms are not so severe and symptoms such as a fever are rare, and that a runny, stuffy nose is more common.

Sources say some people are at risk for the flu. These people can become seriously ill. Some of these people include people with respiratory problems, people with cancer or an immunological disorder and people with serious health problems.

LGB Safe Zone to be established on campus

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

The Chancellor's Task Force for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Matters is sponsoring an "LGB Safe Zone" campaign. All members of the University community are invited to obtain an LGB Safe Zone sticker and display it in a place visible to students, faculty, staff and campus visitors.

"To display a sticker means you are sensitive to lesbian, gay and bisexual issues and will not tolerate homophobia," said Pat Griffin, a professor at the UMass School for Social Justice and Vice-Chair of the Task Force.

The Chancellor's Task Force for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Matters was created by Chancellor Richard O'Brien last year to monitor the GLB climate on campus and recommend ways to improve the quality of life for lesbian, gay and bisexual people at UMass. The Task Force is made up of twenty people appointed by the chancellor.

"We are a cross section of the UMass community representing a variety of academic disciplines. We are faculty, staff, undergraduate and graduate students as well as people of all sexual orientations," Griffin said.

Griffin said after meeting with Chancellor David Scott once this semester, the members of the Task Force felt optimistic.

"I am very encouraged and excited by the enthusiasm of the group and Chancellor Scott's involvement and support," she said.

Paul Vasconcellos, assistant dean of students and vice chair of the Task Force said, "The chancellor showed excellent understanding of issues that lesbian, gay and bisexual people face in academia, on campus, and in society as a whole. He seemed very supportive."

Vasconcellos said the critical role of the Task Force is to act as an advocate for lesbian, gay and bisexual students.

The purpose of the Task Force's "LGB Safe Zone" campaign is to provide members of the university community a way to make known their belief that lesbian, gay and bisexual people deserve to be treated with respect and dignity. According to Griffin, displaying the sticker also indicates an intention to challenge the use of anti-gay slurs, jokes, and other comments and actions that contribute to creating an unsafe or hostile campus environment for lesbian, gay and bisexual people.

The stickers are round and three inches in diameter displaying pink and black triangles enclosed by a green border with the words LGB Safe Zone printed around the triangles. During World War II, pink and black triangles were used in Nazi Germany to label gay and lesbian people sent to concentration camps.

The Task Force will provide support for the GLB Counseling Collective, The Program for GLB Concerns and to lesbian, gay and bisexual organizations.

The broad plan of the Task Force is to make sure that lesbian, gay and bisexual issues are involved in the UMass multicultural agenda and to integrate these issues into the curriculum.

Weld names new chairman

BOSTON (AP) — Lawarence businessman Ruben Nieves was appointed by Gov. William Weld the new chairman of the Hispanic-American Advisory Commission on Tuesday.

Nieves is a business consultant and chairman of the Greater Lawrence Chamber of Commerce.

He helped prepare a recent report for the Hispanic Commissioner that recommended more state economic development aid for its fastest growing minority group.

Neives replaces Deborah Ramirez, a professor at Northeastern University's law school, as commission chairman.

The commission, appointed by Weld and Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci, advises the administration about the needs of the state's growing Hispanic community.

Surfing with Greg Brady

Last night I had a mildly disturbing dream that I was surfing in Hawaii with Greg Brady. I'm sure many people have this same sort of dream. The dramatic cliffhanger "Brady Bunch" episode where Greg wipes out and almost dies in the Oahu surf while the family is on vacation devastated this country when it first aired. It had most certainly left an untold scar on our collective American psyches forever.

Just think about that damned cursed tiki statuette and how everyone almost gets attacked by a giant spider in the middle of the night, and I think you'll know what I mean. I chewed my fingernails right up to my armpits, I tell you. Scary stuff.

Mark Tyler
WENHAM

Now don't get all psychoanalytical about this, but in the dream Greg and I were riding his board together, shooshing our way through the surf, determined to win the contest. Greg's hair gleamed in the sun, his rippling 1970s muscles guided and adjusted the board just so. It was very exciting. Wouldn't you be excited to be on a surfboard with Greg Brady?

Really. Close your eyes. Imagine it. Feel the sensuous salt spray. Feel the hot sunlight on your body. See the clear blue water. Smell the balmy, flowered off-shore breeze. See the tight 70's bathing suit that Greg is wearing. Watch the way Greg's buttocks flex and stretch underneath. Smell that tropical breeze. See the water . . . Greg's buttocks. Greg's . . .Reach your hands out . . . just a little pinch. Greg's buns. Flexing. Squeezing. Blue water . . . Just one more little pinch. The sunlight . . . salt spray . . . the breeze. . .

To hell with the damn breeze! GREG'S BUNS, I tell you!!!

Well! Were you there? Did you see them? Did you pinch one? Don't get me wrong now. I'm not attracted to men at all. Actually, for years I've been obsessed with little Cindy. I've always wanted to straighten out those bouncing curly pig tails of hers. Again, don't get me wrong; I simply meant that I would like to brush her hair. If you thought there were any perverted undertones, I completely deny ever having those kinds of thoughts about Cindy. Even if the cutesy vamp is a little seductress . . .

However, Greg Brady's behind is really a work of art, something beautiful to be admired by everybody (no matter their sexual orientation), especially when it's in a wet 70's bathing suit. There should be a movie about Greg's butt.

The dream went on . . .

Suddenly, behind me, Geraldo Rivera was riding the surfboard with us! Yowza! Imagine that: I was on a surfboard in the middle of a Greg Brady and Geraldo sandwich! Some people would call this heaven, folks.

But then DANGER! We wiped out! Greg's buttocks flexed too much or not enough, and we crashed into the thrashing Hawaiian surf, right into a coral reef. I hit my head and saw stars and little Trix cereal rabbits. I swallowed sea water and started sinking. I couldn't see Greg or Geraldo.

As I sank, my vision started growing faint and gray. And then something incredible happened. From the distance came a large, a very large . . . could it be?

Yes! It was! The Quaker oats guy, Wilford Brimley, was swimming towards me! But what was this? Could that be a . . . he did! He had a fish tail; a big, green, sparkly fish tail.

Wilford Brimley was a mermaid! Get a load of that! Big old Wilford streamed through the water towards me, his old-man boobs flopping about, his sexy tail thrashing powerfully. I smiled. Then blacked out.

I came around on the beach. Wilford's big mustache and lips were an inch from mine, about to give me CPR, Hello! This was NOT RIGHT! I like the work that the man does for oats and all, but there was no way we were going to lock lips while I knew about it. I punched Wilford the Quaker-Oats Mermaid.

Ungrateful? Well, boys and girls, I think that if you'd been looking at that big horse-bush of a mustache close-up like I was, you would have done the same thing. Enough said.

Mark Tyler Wenham is a UMass student.

Yeltsin actually has a vision

If I had to describe Bill Clinton in one word I would choose: useless, procrastinator, indecisive. It certainly is tough to know what he wants or what his VISION is. That's it — vision, ideology — what he means when he rambles about nothing.

Boris Yeltsin on the other hand, has something to say. All the time. Now he's gotten so bold as to throw out the Russian Parliament. What? Is he nuts? Throw out the Parliament?

And why not? Why doesn't Bill Clinton throw out Congress?

MATT BATTAGLIA

I know what you're saying, it's unconstitutional. Yeah, it is, but so what? It's unconstitutional in Russia too. That didn't stop Boris from doing it. His argument is valid for such a bold move. He claims he is the only popularly elected government official in Russian government. He also doesn't think Parliament represents the people.

Do they represent the people? At least we voted for our Congress.

What if Clinton threw out Congress? If there wasn't a revolution or another civil war, (Lincoln, Clinton certainly is not) maybe he could get something passed. For now he lacks serious support from a Congress with a clear Democratic majority. I think I overheard some Democrats argue back in November, "At least if Clinton is elected he'll get along with a Democratic Congress and get something passed." In the words of one Wayne Campbell, "NOT!"

Red Square, Moscow: Over 10,000 people rallied to show Yeltsin their support as they marched and cheered on Sunday. They aren't just cheering him, but hope itself.

Decisiveness. Yeltsin knows his county is in trouble, but he refuses to stand around and be a slug. He already has disbanded Parliament. He claims to be a Democratic president but maybe he realizes that he'll have to go beyond those rules to have a democracy.

The people in Red Square don't seem to mind, in fact, they're applauding him. The Communists pleaded to the army to oust Yeltsin by force. The army wouldn't budge. They stood strong by the side of their president, the president they elected to represent them.

December 12. That's the date Yeltsin wants to have elections for a new Parliament. Boris Yeltsin wants to help Russia, but to do it the Communists have to be ousted. The plan may sound familiar to Americans: a bicameral parliament with an upper Council of the Federation (leaders of the regions), and a lower State Duma. The State Duma will be elected by the population in December if Yeltsin gets his way. The opposition wants a Presidential election simultaneously with the Parliament elections. Boris will not budge. He wants the election for his job to be held in May.

Ruslan Khasbulatov. That is the man who opposes Yeltsin, the Speaker of Parliament. Right now he is sitting in Parliament trying to make a stand against Yeltsin. Can you imagine Tom Foley leading 100 protesters of Clinton?

I think Boris Yeltsin has a vision of democracy, as our forefathers did long ago. I don't know what Clinton's is or if he'll get anything done in the next three years. For now he could learn a few things about bold moves from the Russian president. Clinton wants to be liked, but he has to produce to remain popular. Sadly, I understand another country's leader better than my own.

A case of pregnant teens

"Pregnant Cheerleaders Bringing Turmoil." Now isn't that an eye catcher? Talk about a headline that pulls the reader in with a laugh and sends them out with food for thought.

How could pregnant cheerleaders possibly bring turmoil in their school? Are they taking over a school? Are these cheerleaders giving labor in the classrooms? What great ideas for mini-series!

Stacy
MALONE

The particular article I am referring to spoke of a little town in Texas where three pregnant cheerleaders were ordered off their team and one cheerleader who had an abortion was allowed to continue cheering.

Allowing the young woman who had an abortion back on the team did not show support for abortion, it allowed her the opportunity to choose whether she wanted to be on the team or not. Her health is her concern. If the pregnant women also want to keep cheering it should be their choice, because it's their health also.

Honestly, I don't think their school is worried about the health of these women nor even the liability they may face with pregnant students sommersaulting. I believe it is the whole obsession with role models.

According to the article, their community is concerned about whether or not pregnant cheerleaders can be role models. How funny, I didn't know cheerleaders were role models. I honestly never remember admiring teenage girls who wore short skirts and flashed their butts at the audience while jumping and smiling. But that's me.

Women flaunting their bodies at public events should not be role models — pregnant or not pregnant. But then again, that's me.

The community is putting pressure on these teenage women to be role models to their peers and being pregnant obviously is not part of this ideal. They have no problem pointing the finger at the women, but what about the men? Young women have to be role models, but "boys can be boys?"

Their community is making decisions for these women because they can see they are old enough to have sex and get pregnant, but they do not believe they are old enough to make their own decisions.

I believe if a woman can get pregnant she can also make her own decisions. Neither a community nor a school has the right to decide what extracurricular activities (even if it's sex) anyone can be involved in.

Hey- if they are really that concerned about young women, then they should spend more time teaching them and their partners sex education.

Letter contains generalizations about Puerto Rican culture, behavior

I felt compelled to respond to the letter written by Becky Maloney [Collegian, Oct. 4]. Ms. Maloney is a resident assistant in the Southwest residential area. In her letter she makes one point. She states that she is "sick and tired of some minorities who insist on using racism as a crutch, . . . (and) . . . try to detect racism in a situation when in fact none is present."

Her letter poses problems. Problem 1: If in fact Becky was talking about a Puerto Rican woman on her floor that had the wild party, she should have said that. One Puerto Rican woman. Not "some minorities."

Problem 2: Becky said that the Puerto Rican woman's guests were "among other things, smoking and drinking . . . smashing oranges against the walls, vomiting on the walls, (and) yelling . . ." Wait! Correct me if I'm wrong, but who in their right mind would behave like that? I can understand yelling, but not smashing oranges against walls and vomiting on the walls. I can assure you that such behavior is not typical Puerto Rican behavior. For the past 28 years, I have been going to Puerto Rican parties and have never witnessed such uncivilized conduct.

Problem 3: She also stated that "the majority of her guests were Puerto Rican." What is Becky's definition of Puerto Rican? How does she know that the majority of the woman's guests were Puerto Rican? Was it language, color, appearance, behavior, attire, birth certificates, passports?

Ms. Maloney, you started your letter by stating that you were not "a racist person." I believe you are not, but your statements did more damage than justice. As more minority peoples become experts at detecting racism and ignorance, less mistakes will be made when accusing someone of being racist. Let's work on this.

Trial for bombing begins in NY

Four being charged with World Trade Center blast

By LARRY NEUMEISTER
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The unimaginable happened just seconds after James Reilly drove out of the World Trade Center garage.

"There was an explosion at the exit ramp to the World Trade Center parking lot . . . a tremendous explosion!" Reilly told a 911 operator form his car phone.

Today, Reilly and others relived the experience as they testified at the trial of four Muslim fundamentalists charged with the bombing, which killed six people and injured more than 1,000.

Reilly said he saw "remnants of steel guardrails, thick aluminum tubing, stopsigns" being blown past his car.

Ralph Cruz, who was driving about 100 feet ahead of Reilly, testified that his rear windshield exploded and a basketball size chunk of twisted black metal was lodged in his windshield.

Mohammad Salameh, 26, Ahmad Ajaj, 27, Mahmud Abouhalima, 33, and Nidal Ayyad, 25, are on trial in federal court and could get life in prison without parole.

In opening statements Monday, a prosecutor said no one will testify he saw the defendants make the explosive or leave the bomb in a rental van under the 110-story twin towers. But the evidence will tie the four to each other and to the attack, Assistant U.S. Attorney Gilmore Childers said.

The evidence includes chemical traces on a shoe and saliva on an envelope, the prosecutor said.

Outside the courtroom, defense attorney Robert Precht said it was a "stunning admission" by Childers that no one will testify to seeing the defendants with the bomb.

State finds way to get income

BOSTON (AP) — State tax collectors have a new way to get money from scofflaws — go straight to their bank accounts.

In the past five months, the Department of Revenue has taken $6.5 million from the bank accounts of thousands of taxpayers. Most of the money was for unpaid income taxes.

"We give them every chance before we go in and seize bank accounts," said Katherine Bromberg, a department spokesman. "We notify them several times in writing that the taxes are owed."

California is believed to be the only other state collecting overdue taxes directly from bank accounts, Revenue Department officials said.

Bromberg said before Massachusetts began this program, tax agents had to go through lengthy debt collection procedures to get payment.

"A lot of this is money that would be difficult or impossible to collect," she told The Patriot Ledger of Quincy. "It would involve so much people power to collect it, it would end up costing the state money."

The Revenue Department estimates it will collect about half the money owed taxpayers by tapping into their bank accounts.

Students want to stop violence

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — On Nichole Ducharme's first day at Quincy High School three years ago, she found herself a bystander in what she called a racial brawl.

She was knocked down and splattered with blood by a student whose nose was broken.

Two years later, a gang of young toughs pushed her cousin onto the third rail in a subway station. The boy, who she called "a big brother figure in my life," died, and the youths went to prison.

On Tuesday Ducharme asked the Legislature to establish an anti-violence curriculum for schools. Without it, she said, violence will become a bigger part of students' lives.

"I'm worried about getting from point A to point B, from school to home, and not point A to point B in geometry," said Ducharme, one of about 10 high school students to testify before the education committee.

Ducharme, a senior, said the fight on her first day of high school — as well as "several incidents of guns and drugs" in school after that — opened her eyes to the fact that violence could strike in the halls.

Her eyes filled with angry tears when she recalled how her cousin, Peter Cleuteri, was mugged, beaten and murdered Nov. 1, 1991.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Daniel Raneiri, D-Bellingham, would provide state grants for schools and districts. Although no dollar figure has been set, the bill's supporters warned that getting any money would be difficult.

The bill, endorsed by the committee, would create a panel headed by Attorney General Scott Harshbarger that would help schools develop anti-violence programs for grades kindergarten through 12.

Norfolk County District Attorney William Delahunt said early prevention programs could eventually replace tough on crime solutions such as capital punishment, prison construction and mandatory sentencing.

HSCN airs more Hollywood formula flicks this week

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

This week's movies on the Housing Services Cable Network aren't nearly as wonderful as last week's collection — just a lot of "typical Hollywood formula." The three most strongly recommended are Jacob's Ladder, The Godfather Part I, and Lucas.

Beauty and the Beast — I'll probably receive a lot of hate mail for this review, but this Disney animated feature is predictable formula. I can't believe this movie was nominated for the Best Picture Academy Award. Admittedly, the movie has some extraordinary scenes (the ballroom dance, for instance), but the lead characters leave a lot to be desired. The supporting cast, a clock and candle holder, do have some amusing scenes however. B

Patriot Games — Harrison Ford stars in this movie loosely based on the Tom Clancy best seller. Ford plays a CIA agent who stumbles into an IRA kidnapping and kills one of the terrorists. The brother of the deceased goes after Ford with extreme vengeance until the big finale. You can guess who wins. C+

HSCN Reviews

Pump Up the Volume — This movie really could have been and outstanding story of modern alienation. Yet, the makers blow it with an ending that is so stupid and phony that I can't help but be disappointed by the final product. Christian Slater plays a high school teenager who decides to make his own pirate radio show in order to air his frustration with society. Problems arise when the authorities find out what's going on and when one of the listeners commits suicide. Watch the first half of the movie. B+

Bugsy — Warren Beatty and Annette Bening star in this excellent mobster picture based on "Bugsy" Siegal and his creation of Las Vegas. Barry Levinson deftly directs a fascinating story of love and obsession. Strong supporting performances by Harvey Keitel and Ben Kingsley make this story a true classic. A-

Damage — Why was this movie made? Jeremy Irons is one of the best actors around, yet he cannot save this picture. He plays a cold, aloof British lawyer who doesn't love his wife. Tragedy strikes (of course) when he falls in love with his son's fiancee. Unlikable characters and a unbelievable ending make for a poor movie. C-

Days of Thunder — A typical Hollywood formula picture that stars Tom Cruise as a talented racing car driver. A dull movie that is not only predictable, but also makes race car driving look like an amusement-park-bumper-car-ride. This movie is another reason why I loathe Tom Cruise. C-

A Few Good Men — Rob Reiner directs his weakest picture yet, but still it isn't bad. Entertaining, but at times silly and contrived, this movie does have a strong performance by Jack Nicholson. Check it out if you have nothing better to do. B-

The Godfather Part I — One of the best movies ever made. The complex saga of the Corleone family's rise to power is accentuated by great performances by James Caan, Robert Duvall, Al Pacino and of course, Marlon Brando. From the opening wedding scene to the final baptism this movie is a true classic. Also, the movie gives a new meaning to making an offer you can't refuse. A+

Jacob's Ladder — There are very few movies where I can't guess the ending. Not this movie. This movie is so confusing and so completely fascinating that it's almost impossible to describe the experience. It's like a really bad nightmare that you can't wake up from. Not only is Jacob's Ladder disturbing and depressing, it has an ending that does seem to tie everything together. The theme of the movie has to do with coming to terms with the demons inside you. A

Lucas — Here's another movie that most people probably haven't seen, but should. Corey Haim plays Lucas, a brainy little kid that falls in love for an older cheerleader. An excellent movie that treats its characters with respect and kindness. This movie is something that anyone can relate to.A

Pacific Heights — Squeaky Melanie Griffith and Matthew Modine play a couple who decide to buy a large house they can barely afford. Trouble starts when Michael Keaton moves in and starts impersonating "the tenant from Hell." Modine spends most of the movie flying off the handle to the point where it gets really annoying. A cool ending does save the movie though. B-

Point Break. Here's a concept: take two of the handsomest guys in Hollywood and put then in a surfing movie, and watch the money roll in. C

Movies on HSCN, but not reviewed this week include: Mortal Thoughts, Sniper, The Vanishing, Bedroom Window, Blue Lagoon, Towering Inferno, Modern Problems, Riff Raff and Sleepwalkers.

Sparks exudes what every coach is looking for in a player — a commitment to the team, a desire to see the team succeed rather than concentrate on personal glory.

"I'm not looking for that kind of recognition, I'm looking for team success," said Sparks, who also excels in the classroom and is vice-president of the Student-Athlete Advisory Committee.

"Recognition for me is when the defense gives up zero or one corner like against Northeastern. Those awards don't mean much."

Recognize this: Sparks and the rest of her defensive mates have allowed only 68 shots on goal this season. That's 200 less shots than the Sparks-less Minutewoman offense has taken in only nine games.

they said they couldn't wait until they get to play.

"I transferred from BC, so I'm not eligible to play this year," said Manganaro, a Hockey East Player of the Week as a freshman. "I'm not that nervous because I've gone through this twice, but I'd tell the freshman to try to relax. I think it make take a day or two, but everyone should settle down."

Doyle, a junior player from outside Toronto, Ontario, was curving a hockey stick with a butane torch before practice, even though he is ineligible this year. Manganaro and Keith O'Connell transferred from BC, and are willing to sit out a year in order to play for Mallen.

There were some homegrown talents as well, like goalie Rich Moriarty from Wilbraham, and Rob Bonneau, a star from Chicopee. Growing up, neither player probably thought they would be playing college hockey for UMass.

Yesterday, they were.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES/March 21-April 19): Stick with your dreams and friends — they are your big strengths now! Even if you experience financial problems, an ally will stand by your side. Zero in on practical tasks.

TAURUS/April 20-May 20): An understanding could lead to a lucky agreement. Take the first step on a journey to domestic happiness. A person's character is much more important than beauty.

GEMINI/May 21-June 20): Except for "must-pay" bills, go slow in money matters. Don your thinking cap and look before you leap. Protect yourself from emotional hurricanes. Lend your support to the downtrodden.

CANCER/June 21-July 22): Getting value for your money is not easy today; go by your instincts, not price tags or packaging. Best of all, tuck some funds away for a well-deserved vacation. A friendship deepens.

LEO/July 23-Aug. 22): A newcomer will warm to your big heart and wise counsel. Savor a "good news" day that brightens your independence and love for life. A family celebration is a big hit tonight.

VIRGO/Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Certain social or entertainment activities may be too hectic for your taste. However, sit in a corner with one special person, the mood is perfect.

LIBRA/Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Friends and relatives are enthusiastic about your recreational suggestions. Carry on the good work begun by another family member. Actively pursure romance.

SCORPIO/Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Happily, you are on the same wavelength as your mate today. Make a special effort to restore order to your financial affairs. Personal spending must be curbed until income catches up with outlays.

SAGITTARIUS/Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You have compassion for just about everyone. Why not show the same kindness to yourself? Stop being so self-critical. Forget past mistakes while you relax and enjoy today.

CAPRICORN/Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your sense a major change in a relationship. Hang on! Although your could be in for a bumpy ride, you will emerge from the experience much happier and wiser!

AQUARIUS/Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Better communication is crucial to solving a family problem. Do not end a relationship over a silly misunderstanding. You may have to spend some money to help a young person choose the right college.

PISCES/Feb. 19-March 20): You enjoy being busy and hardworking, even on the weekend. Call someone who makes you feel good about yourself.

Open Letter to UMass Student Community from the Director of UHS Eye Care Program

Dear Students:

A recent survey indicates that a high percentage of students do not know they can receive Eye Care at the UHS. The purpose of this letter is to invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program.

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and The New England College of Optometry in 1975. Since 1975 I have been affiliated with the UHS Eye Care Program. I am very proud of the program and the high quality eye care delivered to the over 70,000 individuals at the UHS Eye Care Program over the last 18 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of The New England College of Optometry where I have lectured to practicing optometrists and supervised fourth-year student/clinicians. Recently I co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. I am also credentialed in diagnostic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry. I have significant experience in all aspects of contact lens fitting and care.

Additionally, we have a well-trained, professional and caring staff with experience in contact lens care and sports vision.

The eye services offered at the UHS include the following:

1. Complete Optometry Examinations that include a health history review, visual acuity testing, refraction ie. eye glass determination, a glaucoma check, cataract screening, contact lens check for those wearing contact lenses and a retina check with pupil dilation, if necessary.
2. Reduced Rates on Spectacle Frames and Lenses from local participating opticians with a complete optometry examination at the UHS.
3. Emergency Eye Care includes the evaluation of eye disease and disorder; these may include, but are not limited to, the following: ocular foreign bodies, conjunctivitis, lid lesions, chemical eye injuries, corneal problems, inflammation of the iris, retinal problems and evaluation of ocular trauma.
4. A Comprehensive Contact Lens service including initial evaluation, fitting if necessary, follow-up care, and same day service on many contact lenses due to our large in-house inventory; all fittings are done by eye doctors experienced in contact fitting and care. We take great pride in being able to fit many people who have had trouble in the past using contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Program over the years has been consistently excellent.

Again, I invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program, conveniently located on campus. If you have any questions about our service, or want to make an appointment, please call 549-2671 x244. I look forward to seeing you.

Sincerely,

Frederick H. Bloom

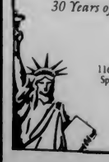
Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Family

Wednesday - October 6
6 p.m.-8 p.m.
UHS - Room 304

I think my roommate has an eating disorder. How can I be sure? What should I do?

I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help. How can I convince her to see a professional? Who should I suggest...Where should she go?



I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia. She says it's under control, but I don't think it is. I'm really afraid...What can I do to help?

If you're concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

For more information, please call

Defensive Sparks a key for Minutewomen

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Besides freshman goalkeeper Hilary Rose, there is one starter for the No. 4 ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team who has not seen one iota of offensive action so far this season.

Her name is Kyri Sparks, a junior center/back, and she has yet to even take a shot.

Imagine Ozzie Smith not getting any at bats, or Ray Bourque not getting any shots on goal. While these players are known as defensive players first and foremost, their involvement in the offense also plays a vital role in the team's success.

That's not the case with Sparks.

"Her role is exclusively defensive," said Minutewoman Coach Pam Hixon. "She's got the real grit job of the team."

"My game is to mark the most dangerous player or threat on the field," Sparks said. "And just to help organize the defense through my marking.

"If I can take my girl out of the game then I make the job easier for everybody else because they don't have to worry about a free girl," said Sparks, who up until this year had been a member of the school's varsity ski team, earning MVP honors her freshman year.

The team's record (8-1 overall, 2-0 in the Atlantic 10) and national ranking are testimony to Sparks' abilities and effectiveness.

Defense didn't always come naturally to Sparks, however. As a senior at Davis Senior High School in Davis, Calif., Sparks played forward and averaged 15 shots per game on her way to establishing both the school and league records for goals in a season (31).

When she arrived at Massachusetts as a non-scholarship player (she's now on partial scholarship) in the fall of 1991, she was switched to a more defensive role and has just gotten better ever since.

"We totally revamped Kyri's game from the forward line to a solely defensive game," Hixon said. "She was more than willing to do whatever it took to adjust. She knows she still has a lot to learn, but she gets stronger and better every day."

"I don't go on offense at all," Sparks said. "In high school, I can honestly say that I didn't do one defensive drill. Now, if I don't touch the ball the whole game, that's great because that means my girl didn't touch it either.

"Being an offensive player helps me be a better defender because I know what they're thinking. I know what they're going to try," said Sparks.

It doesn't take Hixon long to discuss Sparks' strengths as a player and her contribution to the Minutewomen.

"Kyri is so mentally strong; she's extremely strong willed and tough-minded," Hixon said. "She's also physically strong — she doesn't get knocked around by opposing players."

"I wouldn't call myself a dirty player, but against Old Dominion the girl I was marking got tripped up three or four times," Sparks said. "I'd say they know that I'm there — leaning into their back, keeping them off Hilary, keeping them out of the circle to the best of my ability — I'm a pretty physical player."

Women nearly upset UConn in home opener

LESLIE WEINSTOCK / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team, led by first singles player Liesl Sitton, took the courts against UConn yesterday for its first home match of the year.

By DAVE COPELAND

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team almost pulled off an upset yesterday at the Boyden Courts, but fell short, losing 5-4 to the University of Connecticut. The loss set the Minutewomen at 2-5 on the season, while the Huskies improved to 6-4.

Number one singles player Liesl Sittion shrugged off the brutally cold weather and upped her season singles mark to 6-1 with a 6-2, 6-2 win. Sitton also combined with freshman Liz Durant to once again win at the number one doubles spot, 8-1.

"Liesl is an animal on the court," teammate Mary Edwards said. "I wish I had her mentality out there."

Durant also had a perfect afternoon, winning at the number two singles spot in a match that took over two and a half hours. In the end, Durant won the three set match 7-5, 4-6, 7-5.

UMass Coach Judy Dixon said she was very impressed by her young player's performance.

"That was her best match all year," Coach Judy Dixon said. "She really maintained her composure out there today."

"I think I learned something out there today," Durant said. "I'm learning that I don't have to hit the cover off of the ball every time I get out there."

Also winning yesterday was Ana DeCheke at number six singles, 6-1, 6-2. At number three doubles, Pam Levine and Mary Edwards combined for a 6-4, 6-2 win. Levine, Lesley Watts and Stacy Scheckner all lost their singles matches, and Schneker and Watts lost the number two doubles match 8-3.

"Our consistency thing needs work," Scheckner said.

Although she is getting frustrated with the close 5-4 losses (this was the team's third of the season), Dixon said she was pleased with the team's overall effort yesterday.

"UConn is one of the tougher teams on our schedule," Dixon said. "I think we're a lot better team than our record shows right now."

The team travels to the University of Rhode Island on Thursday. The next home match is October 14 against the Dartmouth JV team.

Hockey practice starts

Team on ice for first time in 15 years

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Some of the faces around the William D. Mullins Center practice rink Tuesday afternoon seemed a little bit out of place.

Lou Roe peeked over the balcony to see what was happening on the ice before he headed to hoop practice. Four-year baseball letter-winner Steve Corradi laced up his skates and pulled on his hockey jersey, though he hadn't played competitively for four years.

Even head hockey coach Joe Mallen's wife and two children were there, and they were stuck in the Boston area for awhile when Mallen was first lured to Amherst from his assistant's job at Boston College.

They all had one thing in common: they wanted to get a glimpse of the first day of hockey practice at the University of Massachusetts. Ever.

Practice officially kicked off at 6 a.m. Tuesday morning for the walk-ons, and the recruits came in at 3:30 in the afternoon. Even when UMass had a hockey program in the 1960s and '70s, they had to trek over to Amherst College for practice and games.

But "Hockey Part II" commenced with players marvelling over the $50 million facility that they might play in, provided they make the cut.

"Yeah, I'm nervous. These are try-outs and I'm trying to make the team," said Rich Alger, a freshman who played junior hockey for the Notre Dame Harlems of Saskatchewan, Canada, last season. "I'm fighting for a position with the team, but it'd be nice to be part of something great."

Players like Adam Doyle and Sal Manganaro have to sit out a year, but

Minutewomen win one, drop two in A-10 play

By CANDICE FLEMMING
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team won its first Atlantic 10 Conference match last weekend against St. Bonaventure but lost two A-10 matches to Duquesne and West Virginia.

On Friday, the Minutewomen traveled to St. Bonaventure to take on the Bonnies. UMass had a balanced attack with three Minutewomen hitting double figures in both kills and digs. Susan Maga led the way with 17 kills and 22 digs, having one of her best matches of the season. Kim Mizner had 17 kills and 17 digs and Dionne Nash had 16 kills and 15 digs. UMass took the first game 15-5, lost the second game 11-15, then came back to win the third and fourth games, 15-8 and 15-10, respectively.

The Minutewomen faced two tougher opponents on Saturday and Sunday. Both Duquesne and West Virginia sport identical 3-0 records in the A-10 Conference, good enough for a tie for first place. Against Duquesne, UMass struggled offensively picking up only 13 kills and recording an .083 hitting percentage for the match. No Minutewoman had more than four kills with Rachel Sky-Stiskin, Mizner and Nash all getting four kills each. Sky-Stiskin also had seven blocks on the night, a season high.

"I wasn't real thrilled about the intensity level against Duquesne." Said Coach Bonnie Kenny. "We have a lot of work to do if we want to finish in the top six in the conference and go to the A-10 Championships."

Things didn't get much better against West Virginia on Sunday. UMass still struggled offensively tallying 30 kills and an .035 hitting percentage. The lone standout for the Minutewomen was Nash, who continued her hot hitting with a team-high 14 kills.

"I thought Nash played very well," said Kenny.

UMass' overall record falls to 7-6.

President focuses on Somali crisis

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—President Clinton, angered at the spectacle of an American corpse being dragged through the streets of Mogadishu and chastened by congressional criticism, struggled today to reshape U.S. involvement in Somalia.

One lawmaker who met with Clinton, Rep. Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., predicted Clinton would publicly clarify American intentions in Somalia, addressing the subject of withdrawal and putting a "tightened rein" over military operations.

Clinton held his second meeting in 12 hours with his top national security aides, including Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Defense Secretary Les Aspen and Marine Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, the commander of the region.

Clinton cancelled several public appearances to focus on the crisis.

In an interview Tuesday with Copley newspapers, Clinton said: "It curdles the stomach of every American to see that, because we went there for no purpose other than to keep those people alive."

"It really makes me angry," he said, adding that he is increasingly reluctant to operate under a United Nations structure that he said no longer provides "the help we need to protect our people."

White House aides and members of Congress who met with Clinton today said that the president was surprised by the depth of congressional opposition to a continued U.S. presence in Somalia.

Peter G. Torkildsen, R-Mass, quoted U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor as saying that widespread calls from Capitol Hill for a U.S. pullout came "as a wake-up call at the White House."

Schroeder said the administration promised a new policy announcement soon—perhaps as early as today.

On Capitol Hill today, 65 House Republicans, including Minority Leader Bob Michel, sent a letter to Clinton demanding a clear and concise disruption of U.S. policy on Somalia and a plan for the withdrawal of U.S. forces. "The Somalia policy your administration has pursued is a failure," the lawmakers said.

But Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., speaking on the Senate floor, urged caution and told his colleagues, "it is not a time for panic."

White House Press Secretary Dee Dee Myers said there was "an honest debate" going on among Clinton and his national security advisers on the subject, but that no decisions had yet been reached by the president.

Earlier, Communications Director Mark Gearan said the U.S. goal has not changed: Establish a political structure that will prevent the country form descending into chaos and starvation when U.S. troops pull out.

A senior official who asked not to be identified by name suggested that Clinton was not about to order an abrupt withdrawal of troops from Somalia and that the basic goal remained "to draw down American troops as the security situation allows."

In the interview Tuesday in California shortly before he departed for Washington, Clinton said the specter of Somalis cheering the death of the U.S. servicemen "makes me sick and it's reprehensible since all the Americans ever did was go there and try to save children from starving, reopen the hospitals, and the schools, and give people a safe place to sleep at night."

Peace meeting constructive

Leaders begin to travel the long road to peace

By ALLYN FISHER
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat go down to the business of turning words of peace into reality Wednesday, but there were signs that the generations of enmity would not be easy to erase.

The Israeli prime minister and Palestine Liberation Organization leader had no handshake for the cameras at their first official meeting, which ended with separate news conferences.

Still, the long-time adversaries said their 90 minute meeting at Egypt's Unity Palace was constructive. And they announced the formation of four committees to work out the detail of last month's accord on limited Palestinian self-rule in Israeli-occupied territories.

The task of making peace, already hard, will be made more difficult by continuing violence in the occupied lands. And as at the Sept. 13 signing on the White House lawn in Washington, the prime minister's frostiness toward the PLO chief was noticeable.

Rabin and Arafat sat in chairs about six feet apart when photographers entered. After some urging, the two men moved to a couch and sat on opposite sides of the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak.

But Rubin refused photographers' requests to shake Arafat's hand in front of the cameras, although his aide said the two shook hands in private.

Rabin's coolness recalled his reluctance to take Arafat's hand as the PLO chief thrust it out when they met briefly for the signing of the peace pact.

But it was the prime minister who asked for the meeting, out of concern, Israeli officials said, that only a high level encounter could put accord into motion.

He was also worried that without quick implementation, the pact could be undermined by persisting unrest in the occupied territories.

Israel started cracking down on Palestinian fugitives in the occupied West Bank and Gaza last week, arresting more than 50 suspects, killing three and damaging homes and anti-tank missles.

It's official: Michael Jordan has retired

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass.—Michael Jordan's abrupt departure from the game he has epitomized left Allen McCoy with one gnawing regret:

"You know how sometimes people have a gift, and you don't get to say 'thank you'? We didn't get a chance to say 'thank you.'"

McCoy of Florence, S.C., made the pilgrimage Wednesday to the Basketball Hall of Fame with dozens of other fans in mourning over the retirement of the game's preeminent player. About two dozen collected around a television for the parting works of the man who did so much to put fame into the game.

"We don't get too much basketball information in Germany. But if we do, it's often related to Michael Jordan," said Martin Kreiter, a tourist from Frankfurt. "I think he was asymbol of the best."

Despite Jordan's own pained allusions to his gambling scandals, it was clear that his image shined like a supernova Wednesday at the Springfield based shrine to the game's biggest and best.

"I think he's a great ambassador for the sport. I think the sport is going to miss him in terms of his popularity and fan appeal," said Mark Kelly of Los Angeles, a former player for a small college who was taking practice shots inside the Hall of Fame.

Some admirers simply spent a quiet moment in front of a replica of Jordan's locker, cluttered with his jerseys, sneakers and—of course—a thick pile of fan mail.

SGA president meets with new senators

By BRIAN GORMLEY

The Student Government Association will work to improve the quality of health and food services, financial aid, and to restore litigation rights to the Legal Services Center, SGA President David Nunez told the newly elected student senators at the first SGA meeting last night.

"One of the many issues we will be working on is the legal services issue," Nunez said. "Right now we have a bunch of lawyers who do not have the power to litigate on our behalf. Do you know why this is? I'll tell you. There are some greedy people out there who call themselves trustees but they are totally out of touch with the students."

The legal services center lost its litigation power In 1983 after a woman of color took the University to court on the grounds that her civil rights had been violated and won her case. Soon after, the University's board of trustees decided to strip the LSC of its litigation powers.

"We need everyone's help, and we need to work together," Nunez said to the senators. "I have heard enough complaints about the food here to last me a lifetime. The only thing I heard more complaints about is health services, and what about the brothers and sisters you have who will have to go to a community college because they cannot get enough financial aid to come here?

"The students expect everything of us," he said. "While we can't do everything, we're going to

Former radical given jail term

By JOHNATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON—Former anti-war radical Katherine Power, who came out of hiding to confront her past, was sentenced to prison Wednesday for taking part in a 1970 bank robbery that left a police officer dead.

"To say that I am sorry for his death seems so utterly, utterly inadequate," Power wrote in a letter to Suffolk Superior Judge Robert Banks before he sentenced her to eight to 12 years in prison. She would be eligible for parole in five years and four months.

Standing in a packed courtroom, which included Power's teen-age son who only recently learned about the crimes, the one time fugitive said she "will continue to live my life from this day forward as a responsible citizen abiding by the law."

Banks, who heard emotional testimony from two children of the slain officer, Walter Schroeder Sr., went beyond prosecutors' recommendations by also sentencing Power to 20 years' probation starting Wednesday. Violating the probation would make Power liable to a life term in prison.

"I can think of no greater crime than the one committed by you and your accomplices," the judge said.

Power, 44, who was once on the FBI's "10 Most Wanted List," surrendered last month after remaining a fugitive for 23 years. She pleaded guilty to manslaughter and bank robbery.

As a student at Brandeis University during the Vietnam War era, she and several other people went on a crime spree in September 1970, robbing banks in Philadelphia and Boston and stealing purportedly to help support a revolutionary army.

Power drove the getaway car in the Boston bank heist, in which Schroeder was shot to death. While all her accomplices were eventually captured, Power went into hiding and moved to Oregon, where she took a hidden identity, had a son, Jaime, and got married.

But the burden of her secret led Power into bouts with depression, prompting her decision to surrender.

In addition to the state charges, Power pleaded guilty last month in the U.S. District Court to charges stemming from the armory raid in Newburyport. She faces a Nov. 24 sentencing in that case, although federal prosecutors have recommended it run concurrently with her state prison sentence.

Glad to be here

The orientation process at the University of Texas took an interesting twist when a new student was stabbed at a "Welcome Back" dance.

According to The Daily Texan, the student newspaper of UT, two new students approached two Asian-American women and asked them to dance. The two women's boyfriends grew jealous and began to attack the unsuspecting suitors.

"The guy was attacked from behind by 10 to 15 Oriental males," said UT police Sgt. Julie Gillespie. "His T-shirt was covered with blood from two puncture wounds."

The stabbed man dropped all charges for fear of retribution, according to Gillespie.

The dance was designed to promote participation among new students and allow the freshmen to meet each other.

Armed robbery

U. The National Student Magazine reported this month about some of the most unusual things ever brought into a lost and found at campuses around the country.

Ohio State's lost and found office leads the pack having received such items as an artificial arm and at a different time a fake eye.

"We received those about five or six years ago," said a lost and found worker, who wished to remain anonymous during a phone interview. "I think we sent the arm down to the hospital after we held it for a while. The same for the fake eye. That's pretty much as strange as it gets around here though."

The woman was unsure if the proper owners were ever found and while I found the idea of a fake arm or a glass eye laying around to be humorous, she didn't.

"In every case we try to find the proper owner," she said sternly. "Lost items are serious business."

Eye stand corrected.

Always use a spotter

The U. Magazine had another beauty this month from the University of Minnesota.

By the way, I have noticed the magazine this year has done a lot of stories comparable to "News from other U's." This space, never humble, assumes that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, so thank you to my friends in Los Angeles.

Back to Minnesota, apparently the women's gymnastics team was in for a real treat when Coach Katalin Deli gave the team an instructional video to watch.

The tape, which was supposed to show a gymnastics meet, contained 20 minutes of passionate love making between Deli and her assistant coach/husband in a Miami motel. Instructional indeed.

The laughing ended last May when Deli was fired, although the official athletic department statement asserted the video had nothing to do with the termination.

We are working on finding out the bare truth to the matter.

Gay Studies

The trend of segregated college campuses and "separate but equal" academic departments continued last month, when Kent State University developed a Gay Studies Department, according to the student paper, The Daily Kent Stater.

After what was an "embattled beginning" the founding of Gay Studies was without debate. Next year a new course titled "Sociology of Gays/Lesbians" will begin the trend of Gay Studies.

"It's a sociology course aimed at a specific group of people with a specific sociological experience," LBGU executive director Alyssa Lamb said. "Certainly many people at this university will meet gays and lesbians later in life."

While organized protest never materialized, to the surprise of the newspaper, the sociology department head, Howard Williams, is opposed to the course.

"They study all kinds of weird stuff in sociology and because this doesn't make economic sense, it points to a deeper agenda — legitimizing the gay agenda," Williams said.

Faderman discusses new book

Speaks about hard-learned lessons from our past

By MARNI E. HELFNER
Collegian Staff

In the fourth in the continuing brown bag luncheon series on Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Studies, Lillian Faderman discussed her latest book, Odd Girls and Twilight Lovers: a History of Lesbian Life in the 20th Century.

Faderman is a professor of english and women's studies at California State University at Fresno. She is also the author of Surpassing the Love of Men: Romantic Friendship and Love between Women from the 16th Century to Present.

She reviewed the basic outline to a group of about 30 students and faculty from the five college area.

Discussing first the learned lessons of the 1960s and 1970s, Faderman showed how the feminist movement, the hippie culture, the civil rights movement, and the Stonewall Rebellion ("The hairpin drop heard 'round the world.") all helped to bring about a higher awareness of the the GLB community.

She also said, ". . .The anti-Vietnam War movement which really for the first time, suggested that authority could be questioned; that authority was not sacrosanct. . .authority was getting us, all of us, the whole country, into a lot of trouble."

"The other thing that happened in the 1960s was the sexual revolution. . .with the advent of the pill it was widely acknowledged that sexual relations were not simply for the purpose of procreation," said Faderman.

A point of contention among the participants was when Faderman said, "Women's culture, women's presses, women's music, [all] led to a very unique kind of lifestyle, that I really feel is being forgotten with the advent of queer culture."

Many listeners disagreed with this idea, and in defense Faderman answered, "I'm as queer as anybody, but I want to dress how I want to dress."

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN
Lillian Faderman

Faderman went on to give a brief overview of the rest of her book, primarily on the history from the 1900s to the present day.

"I think she was great, she touched on a critical issue, on a generational issue between us and our students in terms of queer politics, and in terms of women being subsumed into the illusion that they can make a politic with men and not get subsumed by men," said Susan Tracy, a Hampshire College professor of history and American studies.

Peace Corps a possible choice

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

The Peace Corps was set up to help with international development. According to Celeste Landon, a former volunteer, opportunities are abound for college graduates.

Landon will be speaking on the program tonight at 7:30 for those students interested in helping international development after college. It will be held in Campus Center room 917.

Along with four other former volunteers, Landon will be discussing the goals of the Peace Corps, how to become a competitive candidate, and many of the programs that the organization has to offer.

Landon, a graduate of the University of Connecticut, was a Corps volunteer in the Dominican Republic from 1986 to 1988, focusing on health and nutrition. Her undergraduate work concerning Latin America, and also being fluent in Spanish, helped qualify her for the position.

After a 12-week training session, Landon began her two year assignment. Her job was to monitor the children who attended a primary school to determine the extent of the malnutrition. The purpose for this monitoring, she said, was to "try and find the specific causes" of the problem.

Landon said her reason for applying for the Peace Corps was to give back what she had learned in school. She also did a semester overseas and liked the experiences it had given her.

"It's an opportunity to be a leader. To head up a project," said Landon about the Peace Corps.

During her two year assignment, Landon, along with another volunteer, organized two health conferences. The first was a three-day conference concerning women's health. It gave the Dominican doctors an opportunity to share ideas and knowledge with each other and the general public.

After her assignment was over, Landon returned to the States and is now working as a recruiter for the Corps. She did this because she "wanted to give something back."

Landon encourages all college students to make the Peace Corps an option for their future after college.

"I think it's a really good program for young people, especially coming out of college," she said.

Established by the late President John Kennedy in 1961, the Peace Corps is a federally funded international development agency.

Program to promote fire safety

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Correspondent

The week of Oct. 3-9 has been observed across America as Fire Prevention Week. The University Division of Environmental Health and Safety has made a point in recognizing this week on campus.

The Division of Environmental Health and Safety is a program of the University of Massachusetts Health Services.

It was organized to handle problems such as fire, biological, and radiation safety on campus.

The program has grown over the years. What started out as a part-time operation, has developed into a full-time staff that includes both technical and professional specialists.

Fire Prevention Week has been an annual event since 1922. It is sponsored by The National Fire Protection Association. Its original purpose was to strengthen public awareness of fire safety.

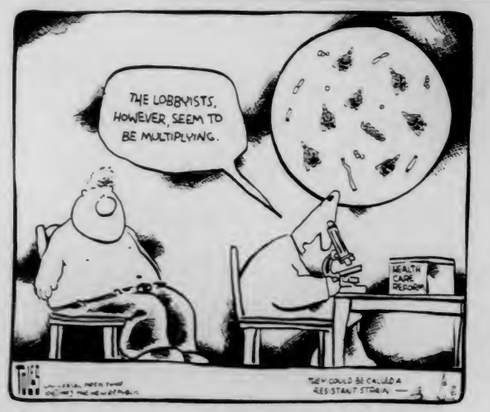
"Our main concern is on safety at home. And home here for the students is in the dorms," said Gary Stikarski, fire safety officer at UMass.

Stikarski said they teach fire safety to the students hoping that they will use it in the dorms. "Our primary goal of our program is directed to the safety of the residence halls," said Stikarski.

Stikarski also explained that the Fire Safety Program relates to teaching students about fire hazards wherever they are.

"Our program has been a great success. It has brought about a great deal of sophisticated fire policies," said Stikarski.

So far, there has not been any major cases where fire has been involved. "We do not see major fire situations on campus. If we do, they are very small," said Stikarski.



Several campus activities will be available this week to provide information about Fire Prevention Week. Wednesday, Oct. 6, there was a fire safety information booth on the Campus Center Concourse.

Other information booths will be set up in the lobbies of the Dining Halls Oct. 4-6. These activities will be co-sponsored by UMass Dining Services, the University Store, and EH&S.

"Fire Prevention Week should be every week. We have to always be conscious of our actions," said Stikarski.

Plans to excavate UMass

Since I transferred to UMass at the start of the semester, many students have cringed their faces and given me a hideous look whenever I tell them I live in Orchard Hill. Some have said, "Mahn, I feel sooo bad for you."

"Dude, why didn't you pick Coolidge?" or "Oh, you're one of those nerds on the hill."

Well, I'm proud to be an Orchard Hill-Billie and "it's better on top, baby." The Hill is a beautiful place to live but I have just a few proposals to make things better for us "nerds on the hill."

Jamie D.
BEARSE

First, the walk up and down the hill is a bitch. Many of us believe we should excavate the hill and level it off, making it handicap accessible. Just think of it, all the work-study students would have a job. And, it would stop us from having to borrow DC trays for wintertime luge purposes — saving the University a bundle of money.

With the dirt from the hill, we could fill in the Duck Pond, simplifying the walk to classes by the Mullins Center. As my good friend Johny Mug once said, "Who the hell needs ducks anyway, you eat them down the street for $20.95." Coupled with the levelling of the hill, no more Duck Pond would enable us to sleep an extra 10 to 15 minutes, depending on the quality of the individual's clock alarm.

Finally, taking all the rocks, old cars, and former chancellors we dig up out of the hill, we would construct a wall. A great wall between Orchard Hill and Buttercrutch (...Oops, I mean Butterfield). The erection of a wall would stop any potential drug traffic up the hill.

Just think of it, the wall would stop the fruitcake bell-bottom, "I feel funky" Greg Brady types from visiting us and treating our lounge windows like tackle dummies after downing 12lbs. of 'shrooms, which is exactly what happened a couple of weeks ago. Thanks for the broken window "Crash" — you're right "it was lightning."

I would personally take a shift watching the wall. As Jack Nicholson said, "You want me on that wall — You need me on that wall!" And, we're not going to put up with any pirate flag pictures on the wall either.

As a new Student Government Association Senator, after I see that my floor gets their lounge back, I will see to it that funding is made for the project. Why not? There's got to be plenty of funding since there's a hiring freeze for professors, yet Chancellor Scott has hired two new shmoes to help out the alumni. Instead of paying them, we could get two more bulldozers, and a couple dozen masons. Ahhh, I figure we could get things all hammered out by Valentine's Day.

Well, if doing away with the pond and building a wall is too much for UMass to handle right now — how about a chairlift. Until then, I'll be soaping up my tray for the first snow fall. Go Orchard Hill Bobsled team!

Fear lurks in the shadows

The autumn's brisk air is slowly moving in on us. The foliage is changing colors on a daily basis. Our walkways are beginning to be filled with dead leaves. Soon daylight savings time will be in effect and we will turn our clocks back, losing that extra dose of sunlight. The campus of 19,000 will be in darkness and soon we will see how unsafe this campus really is.

The size alone of UMass could scare a few, however it should be reality that no one on this campus is invincible from personal danger that instills fear. Without a moment's notice you could become a statistic of campus violence. In the past, present and future there will always be some kind of danger placed upon those of living in UMassteria.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

In one of my classes recently, I was discussing campus safety and how different men's and women's concerns are on the issue of UMassteria. Our assignment was to write a mock editorial as if we were the opposite gender. After finishing the assignment and doing our peer reviews, I realized the validity in the issue of campus safety.

One of the main topics was rape and date rape. A lot of us don't realize what it is like to be a woman alone in an elevator with a few strange men late at night. Better yet, what it is like to leave a party alone. However, the danger of any violence occurring is not only confined to women. There have been reported cases of men getting raped as well.

Hollywood has tried to respond by offering us films like The Accused. But what are the college administrators saying? The administration at Brown University and the infamous Dean Inman told date rape victims, "I think this can be all boiled down to a case of bad chemistry."

The real question here is what UMass officials are going to do about rape on campus, safety and prevention? Chancellor David Scott and Provost Glen Gordon should get their Whitmore cronies together and deal with these issues.

There should be a rape awareness seminar for all university students. The University should distribute mace and/or tear gas along with protective whistles. Our campus walkways need to be better lit and the escort service, including the one to the library, should be made widely available to both men and women without a waiting period.

The University should make it their responsibility to publish weekly police reports, so all students can be aware of things transpiring on and around the campus area. Attacks and rapes should be written about in the paper. Victims may wish to come forward to personalize their incident in an effort to bring others forward. In addition, a 24-hour hotline should be available for all. Health Services and the Every Woman's Center can be of some assistance for victims.

With all these issues on the table we can only hope for a safer campus in which we are all a part of. I have friends that have come forward saying, "Yes, I was raped," and others saying, "Well, this did happen to me, but I'm not sure, maybe it was my fault." I never thought I would meet so many people with personal stories that they carry on their shoulders on a daily basis.

Some have recovered, some have flashbacks, but the fact remains that these are real people and this kind of thing has happened to them. When we see statistics we only see numbers. Try putting a face with each one of those numbers and you'll find that the issue takes on a whole new meaning.

She's no pick-up drivin' inbred

I am writing in response to Derek Milosavljevic's "Sperm Bank Tragedy" [Collegian, Oct. 4]. I understand his article stated his opinion and not that of the Collegian, and it was not his opinion that bothered me. It was a stereotype that Mr. Milosavljevic included unnecessarily in his opinion.

The stereotype is in reference to an unknowing sister and brother having children after their father and mother, respectively, engaged in the process of artificial insemination.

"Twenty-five or thirty years after making a quick decision that paid for a few pizzas, we all know what Derek ends up with, a grandchild with a southern accent and a pick-up truck."

As a Southerner, I was deeply angered by this statement. I, nor anyone I know, is the product of inbreeding.

I also do not own, nor wish to own, a pick-up truck. This kind of stereotype is what keeps ignorance alive. The only thing I hold the newspaper responsible for is not deleting this remark from the text of the article.

As for Derek Milosavljevic, I am sure you cannot help your ignorance.

In the future though, it would be appreciated by the few but proud Southerners in the area if you would please think before making such remarks.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Can you say "crony?" I thought you could.

In this edition of Notes from the Campus Center Basement, we have our first crony alert, coming from none other than the chancellor's office of the Whitmore Administration Building. Imagine that.

Thanks to the eagle eyes of Collegian jack-of-all-trades Mike Carvalho, we noticed an article from Michigan State University's "The State News" student newspaper which mentioned two administrators' possible exodus to the University of Massachusetts.

It just so happens that Chancellor David Scott's last school was MSU, and he appears to have close ties to Marcellette Williams, executive assistant to the MSU president and her husband Keith, who is associate director of the MSU Alumni Association.

Both visited campus on the week of Sept. 13, according to the University News Office, and while they have not yet been hired, the Sept. 20 issue of The State News quoted MSU President-elect M. Peter McPherson as saying he expects Mrs. Williams to take a job here.

"It is my understanding she will stay on a few weeks and then move to UMass," McPherson was quoted as saying.

Meanwhile, we have a hiring freeze — imposed by Scott, of all people. He told this author he's not in a position to comment on the situation, except to say that he and President Hooker have worked out an agreement that the freeze does not apply to them.

Okay kids, let us put two and two together. The Williamses are married. They used to work at the same place. Michigan is very, very far away from Massachusetts.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Get the picture? The two are a package deal, meaning if Scott hires one of them, he'll have to hire both.

We don't have money to hire more professors, or even janitors to clean up this place, but we have money to hire an executive assistant to the president or an alumni association associate director. Figure that one out.

In what could only be called the most bizarre event of the semester, it appears a rodent was seen in the smoking section of the Franklin Dining Commons during lunchtime Monday.

The version this author heard was that an employee saw the rat scurrying around the dining area and attempted to chase and catch it.

It appears in the battle of man versus rodent, man conquered again. Sources say the employee took the captured rat behind the food line.

Franklin DC manager Marion Whalen denied any existence of a rodent whatsoever.

And you thought the scrod was bad.

Speaking of food, we were told that Bonducci's Cafe is running the food area on the first floor of the William D. Mullins Center practice rink. For those who don't know, the rink offers free public skating every afternoon and has racquetball courts as well.

It's good to see the University offering other options besides those in the DC.

If you happen to hit the Mt. Farms or Hampshire Mall movie theater and want to see something familiar, check out the movie Malice. For those who have killed all their brain cells between last fall and now, they filmed part of the movie in downtown Amherst. It stars Alec Baldwin as a demented trauma surgeon and Nicole Kidman as the victim.

No word if Disney is filming part of the movie "The Paper" down here at the Collegian.

Catholicism's doctrines hinder women's rights

At this time in our history, when we are faced with AIDS, the effects of over population, with rampant sexually transmitted diseases, increasing numbers of pregnant teens and with countless gender inequalities, I do not see the relevance or reality in the Pope's reaffirmation of the Catholic church's position against birth control.

I was raised a Catholic. However, I have since "divorced" myself (pardon the expression) from this religion. As my views changed and my interest in women's issues and women's rights developed, I found that Catholicism made a rapidly diminishing amount of sense to me. The two ideologies could not peacefully coexist within me.

I had hopes that Pope John Paul II would address and perhaps make strides toward reform on issues such as birth control and abortion rights and how they affect women, in his encyclical letter entitled "The Splendor of Truth". I was deeply disappointed with the results, but not surprised.

Catholicism is structurally and ideologically male. It has historically neglected the rights and well-being of women in its doctrine. Apparently, motions toward necessary change will not occur in my lifetime; the contents of this encyclical letter only confirm my point.

The foundation of the Church's defense for this document may lie in its position against premarital sex. It implies that Catholics who are single do not need birth control, because they are not having sex, and that married couples should either be reproducing or using the natural (but hardly effective) rhythm method.

Joy
COLLINS

I see this as the pinnacle of the problem. The reality is that people, Catholics included, of various ages are having premarital sex. It is true and the Catholic Church needs to acknowledge its verity, in spite of its stand on the issue.

Much of the progress women have made toward freeing themselves of stereotypes and mandatory domestic duty has been helped by the development of more reliable methods of birth control. It has allowed women some control over their fate and their lives. Taking responsibility for the decision of when and if conception is right for a woman or a couple should not, in my view, stir moral indecision.

Additionally, I cannot fathom why an effort to protect oneself and others against the horrifying, swiftly spreading AIDS disease, by using condoms, should provoke an ethical dilemma. AIDS does not discriminate on the basis of sex, race, class, experience, religion or marital status. We all have a responsibility, a moral one, to protect ourselves and others against AIDS, no matter what our religion might be.

In the October 5th Boston Globe, James L. Franklin writes: "...Catholics who violate the rule [against birth control] with 'full awareness and deliberate consent' commit mortal sin," (according to the encyclical). Since much of the burden of birth control still falls on the shoulders of women, I think this reaffirmation will, for women who make efforts to live in accordance with Catholic doctrine, be a catalyst for a substantial value conflict.

What would it mean for Catholic women not to use birth control? It would mean regression. It would mean unnecessary risks. It would mean that a woman's control over her own body would yet again slip out of her hands. Most importantly, it would mean that the concern of an ideology, one that does not readily include women in its hierarchy, would take precedence over a woman's concern for her own health.

Somali Warlord Aidid calls for late-night advice

I received a mighty peculiar early morning phone call one day last week. I answered it with my typical who's-bothering-me-at-three-in-the-morning tone.

"Ya' know what time it is?"

"Here or there?" the foreign voice answered.

That piqued my curiosity so I decided not to hang up on the usurper of sleep.

"Who is this?" I asked.

"You don't know me — although you may have heard of me. I know I've heard of you, though."

The voice sounded vaguely familiar so I asked him again. "Who in the hell is this?"

Ted

"Aidid," replied the accented voice.

"You did what?"

"No, Aidid. Mohamed Farrah Aidid. You know, 'Warlord Aidid.' Listen Ted, I'm in a bit of a bind. Before your government sent their troops over here, several of us warlords existed — competing for the market. But since your arrival, I'm really the only one left.

"Now I understand that you are considering pulling out, and that would be a shame — not because my competition would return, but because solo warlording has made me an international superstar. I don't want to lose my fame."

He explained that he had called me because he had heard rumors that it was I who made Noriega a household name.

"Listen," I told Aidid, "all I told Manny was that he needed to undermine the initial strategy of the war. Instead of making it a war to stop the flow of drugs, he needed to make it Bush's priority to arrest him. That way people would remember the General and at the same time keep their lucrative drug trade in tact. After all, new kingpins would emerge, and a new set of politicians can be bribed or killed by the drug cartels.

"But it seems that you already have pulled the ol' priority-switcharoo strategy," I added.

"Mmm," he admitted. "But now your government is considering pulling out with or without me. As a matter of fact, it isn't my followers trying to scare people off by saying Somalia will turn into another Vietnam, it's your leaders."

He had a point. I began wondering why our leaders believed that the world fighting a thug and his minions in the post-Cold War era was the same as fighting a war against a government and its southern sympathizers. Both of whom were backed by multiple communist countries.

"Okay Moe — can I call you that? Listen, I have a plan. If you really want Americans to rally behind kicking some Somalli-butt, take some of our grunts prisoner and beat them up. Then humiliate them by videotaping one of them saying that what they were doing was wrong. And it wouldn't hurt you to have some of your people dance around some American corpses being carried in bondage.

"That should surely get my countrymen's blood boiling, you will unite our public sentiment against you."

He thanked me and hung up.

I received a mighty peculiar early-morning phone call yesterday morning.

"Ya' know what time it is?"

"Ted. Rutskoi here. Great plan you bloody genius. Thanks for nothing."(Click).

King's injustice continues

Just when you think it can't get any worse.

All it took to reduce my faith in today's justice system to the murky depths of utter disgust and distrust were six words, ones that made me run scared from the page in last week's Boston Globe.

"Judge delays prison for L.A. policemen."

I have a simple, one-word response to this absurdity. Why? You all know the history behind the issue — it was the goad for the nation's worst riots of the 20th century. It threw the relentless pursuit for racial harmony on its ear and Rodney King and Reginald Denny on their backs.

Troy L.
MERRICK

In an aggravating picture that accompanied the brief story, Sgt. Stacy Koon wore that same cocky, self-righteous smirk — one that I wish I could reach into the photo and slap off his face. I can't detect a smidgen of guilt, and that irks me. I assume it doesn't spark joy in Rodney King either.

After all, Koon probably had that look on his ugly mug while his surgeons were scrambling to reconstruct the Humpty Dumpty job he and his gutless thugs had done to Mr. King. The bone on one side of King's face was (sorry if you're reading this at lunch, at least there's no color photo of it) crushed to powder.

Nonetheless, some yahoo on the bench has set the bureaucratic ball of justicelessness rolling by delaying their prison sentences to — get this — a minimum security work camp. You get harsher sentences than that for throwing paper airplanes and spitballs in grade school!

And what about the sentence in the first place (which, pardon the pun, is more like a prepositional phrase than a sentence)? Two and a half years! I spent almost that long choosing a major.

And I really like the caption under the photograph of Koon. "Stacey Koon talks to parishioners after attending Mass Sunday in..." It reminds me of the picture of Mike Tyson praying by himself in front of an altar after the Desiree Washington rape conviction a while back. Too little, too late, too hard to swallow.

Don't get me wrong, however. I don't exactly hope to see the guys who messed up the helpless Denny (put the sandwich aside a second, his eye had fallen down behind his cheek, just to give you an idea how bad it was) go scot-free either. Live by the sword, die by the sword; do the crime, do the time; whatever appropriate phrase you want to use.

I also assume I am not alone when I express disgust with the conditional way the law is carried out and defended of late. The tiniest loopholes and grey areas of the law, and how it seemingly changes from situation to situation, are manipulated to get the scum of the world back onto the streets and into victim's nightmares. These are dirtballs whose own mothers didn't want them out of prison, much less want them at the kitchen table.

Although they can't hear me, I apologize to Rodney King and Reginald Denny on behalf of the punks who violently and senselessly changed their lives forever. And again on behalf of the insecure justice system that the so-called "home of the brave" is stringing its shoes with.

I apologize for the system's sheer inability to see the atrocities these men endured. But I know they saw it. It's on a damn videotape, for crying out loud.

I'm just really, and I mean really glad I wasn't in Los Angeles at that time. I wouldn't want to have been the target of an airborne brick or rock. I wouldn't want to be assimilated into a group of "haters" or "hated." And I certainly wouldn't want to have the same ham-and-eggers that sit in today's top judicial seats determining my future; that is, unless I wore a badge too.

Prof resigns, denounces Senate

I preferred the Senate when it aspired to be a deliberative body rather than one whose response to a troubling issue is a knee jerk.

The Senate's vote at its 24 September meeting to "dissociate" itself from Professor William Kerrigan's remarks in Harper's served, as even its backers admitted, political expediency. But it did not serve other values, those of informed debate, consideration of consequences, and simple fairness to Professor Kerrigan.

It was false for the Rules Committee chair to imply that Professor Kerrigan had violated the University's several harassment policies in his Harper's remarks. It was false for Professor Allen's motion to imply that professor Kerrigan favors unprofessional relations between faculty and students. Had the Senate deferred its action long enough (two weeks) to ascertain Professor Kerrigan's current views on what University policy ought to be, it would have learned that he condemns sexual harassment in any form and favors a prohibition on consensual relations between faculty and current students.

I am surprised that the University administrators present, several of whom were well aware of Professor Kerrigan's actual policy views, chose not to inform the Senate of this relevant information.

There was nothing of a policy nature in the Senate motion it turns out, with which Professor Kerrigan disagrees. Even were this not so, the question of when and why the Senate should condemn (and that is the effect, behind the euphemisms) a colleague's opinion has not been addressed, let alone given an answer we can live with. I, for one, cannot live with a Senate willing to act so unwisely. I don't just disassociate myself from this action of the Senate, I resign from it.

work damn hard to do as much as we can."

Student Trustee Al Lizana said the five college board of trustees recently voted to increase the salaries of two chancellors in the University system to make them more equal with the pay of the chancellors at the other UMass campuses. UMass-Boston Chancellor Sherry Penny's salary was raised $21,400 and UMass-Lowell Chancellor William Hogan's salary was raised $14,094. Lizana said it is a poor time for the chancellors to receive pay raises.

"The chancellors are well paid, and I think it is hypocritical for them to receive a pay raise in these times of fiscal crisis. The University faces a $7.7 million shortfall for fiscal year 1994, which is a big hit for a university of this size."

Lizana said only two of the five student trustees who sit on the five college board of trustees are allowed to vote. But he also said he is working with the other student trustees to pass legislation in the Massachusetts State House to give all five student trustees the right to vote at trustee meetings.

UMass is the second most expensive public institution in the country, Lizana said.

Public Relations Director Manuel Aguilar said the Student Government will be committed serving the needs of the students on campus.

"I don't think that the students here at UMass are apathetic. I think that they are uninformed," he said. "The senators need to get out there and meet their constituents and to let them know that they are there to help them with any problems that they might have."

Is the U.S. seeking to colonize Somalia?

Felicia
COUSINS

The U.S.-led military invasion of Somalia, after months of standing by while hundreds of Somali people starved, was initially deemed a "humanitarian mission." It has however, evolved into a war between the citizens of Somalia and the United States with the U.N. troops acting as their puppets.

Why are U.S. Troops In Somalia?

New York Times, Oct. 5 — "Clinton ordered several hundred fresh U.S. troops to Somalia today, plus heavy tanks armed with personal carriers, helicopters, and gunships in the aftermath of heavy American losses in a United Nations military operation in Mogadishu on Sunday." According to the New York Times, the latest Pentagon tally indicated that at least a dozen American soldiers had been killed, 78 wounded.

On Sunday, Sept. 17, 1992, President Bush announced plans to send troops into Somalia for the sake of "delivering food." On this occasion, a special envoy to Somalia, MoHamed Sahnoun, said that the Pentagon plan could upset "delicate negotiations." Nevertheless, this did not deter the U.S. military leaders from sending over 1,800 U.S. troops into the country less than five months later.

Considering the U.S. could certainly have mounted a massive international relief effort that would airlift food to Somalia, the Pentagon decided instead to use 30,000 troops to enact a military occupation of the country, the question still remains, what are the real motives in the operation? What ever happened to "Operation Restore Hope?" What happened to the "Humanitarian mission to feed people?"

The massacre of over 100 Somalis on Thursday, Sept. 9, by U.S. helicopters, gunships, and tanks proves that this is no "humanitarian mission." This outrage can be compared to the slaughter of Native Americans by the U.S. cavalry. All this so-called talk of "humanitarianism" is a covert way of saying "we want to take over." The International Action Center believes the primary purpose of the Pentagon operation is to turn Somalia into a strategic military base along the Red Sea/Suez Canal shipping route, so that the U.S. can tighten its domination over the vast oil resources in the Middle East.

Americans were led to believe Somalia had disintegrated into warring clans that are preventing any aid from getting to the people. Hence the need for outside armed intervention. Once the GI's landed in Mogadishu, the media was to sell the world pictures of smiling women and children. Instead what we have seen is the horrifying photographs of men, women and children being shot during raids on Somali townships, guns pointed at the heads of young Somali boys, and women and children being manhandled by the "troops of hope".

Who is the WarLord – Clinton or Aidid?

The continual use of the racist term "Warlord" when referring to General Mohammad Farah Aidid feeds on the latent xenophobia of the American people providing a host of excuses for their carnage.

The U.S. military commanders say their immediate goal is the capture of General Aidid and his top associates. This absurd explanation allows U.S./U.N. troops to attack innocent Somalis. For instance, U.S. Cobra and Black Hawk attack helicopters fired missiles and thousands of rounds of cannon fire in an unprovoked attack against heavily populated southern Mogadishu, killing as many as 73 civilians. The sheer brutality of this aerial bombing and missile attack on Mogadishu, aimed at headquarters of Somali General Aidid, lends support to the fact that the U.S. troops are at war in Somalia. Yet, the Pentagon refuses to classify it as such.

The U.N. special envoy to Somalia, retired Admiral Jonathan Howe (Clinton's minion), announced a $25,000 reward for the capture of General Aidid. It is outrageous that the U.S. actually recruits hired guns for the kidnapping of respected citizens of a sovereign nation. Warlords Bush, the Clintons, Colin Powell and other leaders of our great nation have a lot to account for. They direct "legal" attacks on innocent people all over the Third World. American soldiers over the last thirty years have killed 2 million people in Vietnam, over 1 million in Korea and 300,000 Iraqi citizens. Have we forgotten this mass annihalation of so many lives in these various nations? Why is it that we would never consider these atrocities the actions of warlords?

Racism and colonialism go hand in hand.

In a move that so closely resembles old style colonial aggression, the U.S. didn't bother to consult the Somali people regarding the occupation of their country. They have alienated (while trying to kill) the only Somali leader they could have once negotiated with, General Aidid. Upon entering Somalia, soldiers were told they could shoot anyone who they "perceived as a threat." Somali youth were being called "mad dogs" and "strung out druggies" by racist U.S. troops. This should ring close to home for a vast majority of Black and Hispanic-Americans who are given similar titles when they react to the horrendous conditions they have to survive in our inner cities.

The media treats the famine as an inevitable consequence of drought and war. The countries of sub-Saharan Africa are deprived of the most elementary provisions during times of food shortages and crop failure. The underlying cause of African famine, which has now taken millions of lives in Somalia, is the brutal exploitation of the continent by imperialism. The ruthless drive for profit is thrusting the African peoples into poverty and depredation.

But hunger is not exclusively a "Third World Problem." It will exist in any nation where poverty and misery are inevitably produced by capitalist exploitation. In South Africa, the sixth leading gra producer in the world, 3 million Black children suff from malnutrition. In the inner cities of the Unit States, one of the richest and most "powerful natio in the world, infant mortality rates sore, lack of r education is an epidemic, and some families do n have the basic needs of food, shelter, and clothing.

Shouldn't we be undertaking a "humanitarian mission" at home?

Americans and people of wealthy nations need no be passive listeners when our "warlords" announce with arrogance, and little genuine concern, that they have "sufficient force to dominate a country and deliver food to starving people." The Pentagon obviously underestimated the power and the ability of the Somali people at self-government. The anti-imperialist consciousness of the Somali people forged in the long history of resistance to colonial domination by the British and the Italians is their most powerful weapon. They cannot launch aerial attacks against modern day colonization by the United States.

Petition To Address ALANA Concerns

This Petition is being endorsed by the Muticultural Affairs Page desk.

Context of the Petition:

W.E.B. Du Bois fulfilled many roles in his lifetime before he died in 1963. His socio-economic and political writings on race relations are considered masterpieces, relevant even today. He was a leader of the African American community, an organizer, a journalist, a publisher, a poet and a family man. But the role he valued most was that of an educator. W.E.B. Du Bois acknowledged that his greatness emanated from the access to education, and that the liberation of his community and all oppressed peoples would flow from knowledge and thought. It is this spirit with which we tie together the naming of the Tower Library and the issue of access to public higher education.

In the name of multiculturalism, diversity and accessibility, we the undersigned at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst demand the following:

1. Keep the pledge made to the ALANA students in the fall of 1992. Increase the enrollment of ALANA students to 30%, at both the graduate and undergraduate levels.

2. Increase the availability of scholarships for economically-disadvantaged students.

3. Name the Tower library after the African American educator, organizer, and leader W.E.B. Du Bois.

4. Change the UMass mascot from the "Minuteman" (a racist and sexist symbol of a white man with a gun) to a symbol that is appropriate for an institution of higher learning.

Everywoman's Center — Crisis in Leadership

Shyamala
IVATURY

In a letter to the Collegian, Wallace stated that a "management team" comprising of staff and students are collectively responsible for decision making in the EWC. The annual report (1991) of the EWC states, "the distribution of funding is determined by the Director with input from... ". The reality is that Ms. Wallace was responsible for the cutting of funds for the Third World Women's Program and the WAGES and Bridge Program, as she is the person who has the final say in the allocation of funds within the EWC. Rather than acknowledge her racism and elitism, Ms. Wallace has tried to place the blame on her staff, by implicating them in the decision.

Ms. Wallace, rather than confronting racism within the EWC and making changes, hired a "racism consultant" for thousands of dollars last summer. Spending scarce resources on paid consultants rather than taking concrete measures is indicative of Wallace's bogus commitment to the fighting of racism and elitism. Concrete actions should have included: the diversification of the EWC staff and implementation of programs for women of color, in a manner such that they are not set up to fail. Allowing for substantive internal and external critique demonstrates a serious desire for material change.

The students of color working in the EWC are placed in an untenable position. They are often silenced or forced to assimilate. Those who dare express their opinions vocally are humiliated. The students of color working in the EWC need the employment. Hence, it is often the economic imperative that forces them to silence their voices.

Historically, programs designed for women of color have been "set up" to fail, providing an excuse to eliminate them as ineffective. Rather than create a culture where women of color feel integrated into the organizational structure, their ghettoization persists.

The EWC leadership tries to account for organizational efficacy by claiming fiscal crisis. Resources are always limited for women's programs. The poverty mentality fostered by the EWC "old guard" is a cover for their comfort with the status quo. This is what Wallace should have done: guarantee the availability of multi-lingual counseling; agitate for scholarhips for women in poverty; create a space where women from the community can meet to socialize and strategize, thereby reducing the alienation felt by women in higher education. With sufficient energy and creativity, the EWC could have affected real change with the given resources.

"Prevention is better than cure"

Rather than design measures that prevent the occurrence of rapes and asaults, the EWC is largely reactive. Why is it the case that all first-year students are not provided with statistics on date rape, acquaintance rape, sexual assault and so on? Why is there no insistence on mandating rape awareness workshops for all first-year students? Why is the archaic practice of Rush week not criticized, considering a large number of the rapes occur during this time? Why has there been no reaction to Dr. Kerrigan's statements?

It is not in the interest of most women to see rising numbers of rapes and assaults. Ironically, it is only in the interest of those women whose income depends on "reaction to crisis" rather than its prevention, namely the leadership of the EWC.

Given the fiscal crisis UMass finds itself in, there is an urgent need for the EWC to reorganize. This cannot happen without visionary leadership, organizational restructuring based on community input, and power sharing between white women and women of color.

It is time for there to be a comprehensive review of the "Everywoman's" Center. This review should be overseen by women who have no self-interest in the preservation of the status quo. Radical change is needed for women's lives to change.

Jon Dickerson when speaking of his woeful Owl team. It's no fun to be a division I-A and take weekly poundings like the Owls, who have been pounded 186-14 in their last three games. Let's remember that before we all get so eager to push UMass to the upper division.

Just like last season, Alabama is just running through their schedule without much trouble on their way to the title. No one on their schedule can beat them this season.

I'd like to throw Superhuman QB Heath Shuler of Tennessee into the Heisman Trophy race. He's a better pure passer than Ward and a much better leader. FSU has all the talent in the world, but Ward has to hold it all together. Shuler has led a Volunteers team to the top 10 without half the talent Ward has.

Tyrone Wheatley ran for 113 yards and caught another 60 in the air in Michigan's 24-7 win over Iowa. He rolled up three more touchdowns, but the race between he and Ward for the Heisman should be more than a statistics battle.

Wheatley can do it all, from returning kicks and punts to being the best player on the field at either running back or receiver. His unparalleled versatility still makes me pick him as the favorite, especially with Marshall Faulk slipping more and more out of the picture.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An investment shows a return earlier than you anticipated. Celebrate with your mate in a quiet spot. Romance takes an exciting turn. Telling a friend what you plan to do next pays dividends.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your reputation attracts members of the opposite sex. Strive to make intelligent choices. Show parents the respect they deserve. Paying bills on time protects your credit rating.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The undercurrents of a relationship need to be dealt with head-on. You come out of a family argument in fine shape. Refuse to let a bitter person rain on your parade.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do something to cheer up a friend or family member who has suffered recently. Take a calculated risk. A relationship can be salvaged if you face up to your responsibilities.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your enthusiasm for an afternoon outing wanes. Think about curling up with a good book instead. You may find yourself attracted to a good friend.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Learn how to handle anger and relationship problems will end. Romance improves when you invite your mate to say more about what is happening in your life.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A conflict could be resolved if you discuss your differences away from the public view. You are the best judge of what you need and do not need. Stand up for your rights.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You will do better in the long run if you follow the rules. Cutting corners could hamper your career. Romantic partner demands that you give as much as you get.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Follow your instincts when handling financial and career matters. Your thorough approach will be richly rewarded. Someone is keeping close tabs on your personal life.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Married couples find new sources of pleasure. Your commitment to family life brings you widespread respect. If overweight, your health will improve with every pound you lose.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Quiet study or meditation holds special appeal today. Your mate or partner is especially sensitive to your needs. A frank discussion about family finances will help avert an ugly confrontation.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A conversation or sermon prompts you to give more thought to other people's needs. A visit or small gift will work wonders.

• My dog Bo and I prepared for his upcoming fight against fellow Belchertown wooter, Lucky, by watching "Raging Bull." Bo was wagging some serious tail throughout and asked if we'd now call him the Belchertown Bomber. Joe Pesci will be on hand when Bo makes his return to the ring.

• Now if the UMass football team can play all its games at home against teams with purple and white uniforms, the rest of the season should be a snap. Regardless of opponents' uniforms, If Coach Mike Hodges' troops can keep up last week's intensity they'll have a good chance at slamming the Rhody Rams.

• Enough of this disrespect for Pam Hixon's field hockey team. The Minutewomen upset No. 2 Old Dominion and still don't break into the top three. Fair enough. Hixon's ladies will earn their respect ON the field.

By the way, who was the bozo smoking the victory cigar after the ODU win?

• The battle for Scrunchy Queen heated up last week when Leanne "I've Got 300 Scrunchies in a Can" Russo entered the Media Relations office brandishing about eight of the cloth-covered elastics on each arm and six on each leg.

• Sources close to the women's soccer team are claiming that Paula Wilkins' hamstring injury last weekend was a direct result of having appeared in this space. My lawyers tell me I am completely covered for any jinx that may result from being mentioned in this space.

They also tell me the reason I'm covered is because at least one other person has to read what is written in order to prove the jinx. Lawyers think they're funny.

Women's soccer defeats Yale in offensive push

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

There were times during the second half of yesterday's Massachusetts-Yale women's soccer game, that Bulldog goal keeper Melanie Dixon must have felt like she was inside the Russian parliament.

The pressure was non-stop, volleys were coming in from all directions and her defense was not keeping many shots out.

Massachusetts	6

"They just kept coming," Dixon said. "They are a good offensive team."

The Minutewomen (8-2-1) rifled home six goals, their highest output since 1989, a 6-0 shellacking of Holy Cross, where now-assistant coach April Kater scored a hat trick, to crush Yale 6-0.

"That was the best team I have seen that's lost 6-0," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "I can't believe we won by six goals."

Yale, which dropped to 3-5 on the season, had played some tough teams this season, including Hartford (a 3-2 Hawk victory), but yesterday the Bulldogs had no chance as the UMass offense capitalized on the opportunities it was given.

Senior Colleen Milliken started the barrage in the fourth minute, when she picked up a Rachel LeDuc pass at the top of the penalty box. Milliken drove by one defender and placed a shot by Dixon.

UMass was held scoreless until the second half, when things began to roll. In the 49th minute, Heidi Kocher knocked down a Nicole Roberts cross, stepped by one defender and bombed a shot just under the cross bar from 20 yards out.

A minute later, Melissa Mitchell, at midfield, squared a pass to Roberts on the left wing. Roberts sped down the sideline and banked a shot off the crossbar and in from 15 yards.

With 14:06 remaining, Rebecca Myers scored the first of two goals on a corner kick. Kocher's serve went through a crowd in the goal mouth, where Myers knocked it in.

Mitchell got into the act in the 81st minute when she picked up a loose ball during a scramble in front of Dixon and planted it in the back of the net. Myers capped the day off with only 1:03 remaining as she headed another Kocher corner kick in.

"The entire front played fantastic offensively," Rudy said. "Especially Roberts. She scored on a left foot cross, she created two goals and one corner, which we scored on. She played great today."

Briana Scurry (80 minutes) and Sherry Keenan shared the shutout, UMass' seventh of the season.

With their offensive statistics well padded, the Minutewomen now turn their attention to Saturday's road trip to No. 4 Hartford.

STEVEN PEDULLA / COLLEGIAN

The No. 10 University of Massachusetts women's soccer team upped its record to 8-2-1 with a 6-0 trouncing of Yale Wedenesday afternoon at Garber Field.

Yarworth an inspiration in and out of the pool

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

He walks around the Boyden pool gingerly, keeping a close eye on his water polo boys. Whistle in hand, and a smile on his face, Russ Yarworth is at home.

Around the pool, around the game, he loves being around his boys. At home, he says.

His job description is plain and simple: Massachusetts water polo head coach. And he does it quite well. But Yarworth takes that job one step further. Those lucky to be around him daily say he's more than a coach. He's a friend.

"As a friend, he's the best friend I have," said senior co-captain Tasan Engin. "When I broke my arm, he came over to the hospital and was sitting there right by my side."

To Javier Gonzalez, Yarworth was a counselor pointing him in the right direction. When Gonzalez came to school in 1991 as a freshman, he spoke little English. One of 20,000 plus, it would have been easy for him to get lost in the shuffle. But Yarworth wouldn't let it happen.

"To me, he's been very helpful," said the junior. "It was very hard my first year here. I talked to him a lot and he was very patient."

As a coach, he's a motivator, getting the most out of his players. When they slack off that little bit, he's there, hovering over them and urging them to work harder.

"I think it's a lot of my competitive nature," Yarworth said. "I expect them to go through the wall to make themselves better athletes.

"I always talk about team dynamics, and our team dynamics are very important because you only go as far as the team is going to take you. If the individual can't sublimate their ego for that, then they're not going to be a viable contributing member."

Jeremy Alters, who's played under Yarworth for four years now, says the motivation helps the team come together.

"He's a great motivator. He knows how to bring guys together," said the co-captain. "He builds you to a level you should be at, and then takes you past that level."

That level is not only in the pool, but out of the pool as well.

"In a way he's like a father figure to me," said Engin.

FSU Seminoles are unstoppable

BLINDSIDED
Anthony Guido on College Football

The runaway train that is Florida State continues to steamroll and on Saturday the Seminoles look to finally beat Miami in the big game. This time FSU has it together for this year's "game of the season."

Heisman hopeful Charlie Ward threw four more touchdown passes in a routine 51-0 demolition of Georgia Tech. On the other hand, Miami struggled in its victory over Georgia Southern.

Miami's not the same team as in years past and this indeed is Bobby Bowden's best team ever. All this and the home fans in Tallahasee should make for a big win for the Seminoles. Led by Derrick Brooks, the defense will key FSU. Scott Bentley can miss as many extra points as he wants (he's already missed seven), the 'Noles romp 33-14.

• Next in line might be the Florida Gators. Danny Wuerffel has emerged at quarterback, throwing for 449 last week in only his second start. They've got the offensive weapons; too bad their defense may not be national championship caliber.

Was that Dan Marino wearing the number 13 for Boston College last weekend? Wow, Glenn Foley (423 yards passing) outguns Marvin Graves as BC stuns everyone in beating Syracuse. Those crybabies up in Syracuse have nothing to complain about; see ya in the Aloha Bowl!

• "This is more than a rebuilding process, it's like giving birth".

Those were the words of downtrodden Temple coach

Eliminate the long lines for sports tickets

By JAMIE D. BEARSE

Tired of freezing in line for sports tickets on early December mornings? The Minutemaniacs Sports Booster Club can let you sleep in, dreaming of a Lou Roe dunk, or a Sal Manganaro slap shot by guaranteeing you advanced tickets to all University of Massachusetts men's basketball and hockey games.

"We're expanding in more ways than one," Mark Wilson, director of the club said. "Last year there were 200 members, this year we're expanding to 500."

Wilson also added that he hopes to add season tickets to football, women's hoop, baseball, and field hockey.

"By expanding to other sports we encourage greater fan participation," Wilson said. "We'll have at least one game reception for every sport that we cover throughout the year."

Students can pick up their tickets on Wednesdays instead of Thursday mornings for a $25 membership fee that also includes "The Maniac" Newsletter, a Minutemaniacs' hat or T-shirt, and membership card.

Wilson also is going to have an initial meeting for all old and new members to discuss what the club priorities should be: VIP receptions, football tailgate parties, and the possibility of scheduling a bus trip to the February 13 meeting in the Meadowlands, N.J., between the Minutemen and the Kentucky Wildcats.

Returning members to the booster club can register at the lobby of the Curry Hicks Cage tommorrow from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m.

Students who would like to sign up as new members can do so at this Saturday's football game against Rhode Island at the Maroon and White tent inside the north gate during halftime.

The Minutemaniacs booster club encourages new members to sign up Saturday because, according to Wilson, the 500 spots will fill up fast.

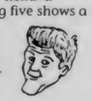
The Collegian's Guide to Arts & Entertainment in the Five College Area

Let there be LATE NIGHT



SM

by Shawn McDonnell

The talk show rating wars have begun, and some old pros and new faces have been thrust into the arena of battle. Here is an early look at the best and worst.

The Tonight Show with Jay Leno: Once upon a time, this block-jawed goof was a helluva comedian. But the pressure of doing five shows a week has turned Leno from a spry, sarcastic gremlin into a dull, ugly guy in a suit. His monologues are full of duds (or weary echoes of better jokes on other talkshows) prepared by a writing staff which has yet to give the audience something worth repeating at the water cooler.

What's worse, Leno has become so softened by trying to seem amiable to retiree Carson fans that he softsells his best material, plays a cringing yes-man to his guests, and pushes sketches so thin and humorless that they would make Rick Dees blanch.

One of the program's more daring, unscripted moments saw Leno dressing up as Santa Claus and holding court in a mall. But where Chevy Chase might have denied that he was Santa, Letterman might have antagonized the children, or Conan O'Brien might have shown up in July, Leno just sat there and asked everyone what they wanted for Christmas.

That's the sort of evening one has on The Tonight Show.

Bottom Line: Once-great comic, once-great show, but once is enough for tuning in this NBC loser.

The Late Show with David Letterman: The talk show wars may scarcely have begun, but Letterman is already the victor. His scripted comedy trounces the best that Jay Leno can produce (where else could you see Andy Dick playing "The CBS Paige Who Likes To Suck Up"?) and his improvised comedy makes some of the best viewing on TV. In one recurring segment, the peninsula-haired imp takes to the streets of NYC to play "May We Have Some Free Stuff, Please?" a freestyle gameshow in which he shamelessly exploits his TV clout to get presents from shopkeepers. This new season on CBS has also seen Dave making unnecessary phone calls to a Traffic Watch Hotline ("everything's still okay where I am"), and harassing elderly New Jersey residents ("If I told you I had a naked woman in the van, would that interest you?").

Letterman is also the most expert interviewer on the late night scene, able to derive fun from anything a guest does — whether it is plug a movie or (as in one case) silently eat cheese. Add to this the goofy retro-1970s bandleader Paul Shaffer and the much-imitated Top Ten List and what you have is an hour of enormous entertainment.

Some folks might be turned off by Letterman's abrasiveness, but it is hard to stop smiling when you see the gap-toothed goof gnawing on a cigar and badgering a muffler shop employee into giving him "the birthday special."

Bottom Line: The only show on TV where the host is likely to shoot at studio technicians when he senses a "lull." Simply the best.

Arsenio: the hip Mr. Hall doesn't fall into the category of "white men in suits," and he doesn't sit behind a desk.

This alone should help make his show worthwhile and interesting — but it doesn't. Arsenio's late night act consists of "woofing," leering, innuendo, and scatalogical jokes. A typical monolgue (from a show with Mandy Patinkin, of all people) had Hall showing his posterior to the audience, and warning them to look out for the Big Butt Lady. Who could make this interesting?

When Hall first started at this game, as the umpteenth host of Fox's disastrous Late Show, he was quick and funny. In his first telecast, he laid claim to the studio, and began firing people just for the power trip. The moment seemed to announce an important new arrival. But over the years, this slick irreverence has mutated into cheap potty humor, targeted at children who should really be in bed. It is unentertaining — and with ratings in a nosedive and numerous Fox affiliates dropping him for Chevy Chase, it is also a little pathetic.

Bottom Line: Goodbye, Arsenio.

The Chevy Chase Show: The Saturday Night Live alum tests his chat skill on this expensive Fox creation, and the results are better than one might expect. Chase is not a great interviewer, which makes for some tense moments when the guests start getting boring, but its hard to dislike someone who tries so hard to entertain you.

Chase has taken some chances, doing the type of film segments and sketches that always flop on Leno and making them work. In a commercial parody of a fast food dive, Chase accuses the competition's secret sauce of containing ungodly elements. In another segment, he covered himself with pancake makeup and sat in a wax museum. Watching visitors closely examining the docile star was hilarious, as was their reaction when Chase leapt, screaming, to his feet. One visitor started to cry.

Chase has also enjoyed some truly entertaining guests, such as pool sharks (who taught him how to hustle) and a little boy from the Soviet Republic of Tuva, who could sing two notes at the same time. The latter entered the studio wearing a domed fur hat, and left with a Chevy Chase cap.

Bottom Line: The interviews are not always satisfying, but Chase is already better than Dennis Miller or Whoopi ever were, and his regular News Update is bounds better than the new ones on SNL.

Late Night With Conan O'Brien: The latest arrival on the late night scene is this big-headed freak, with the unnerving hair. O'Brien is a bit of an oddity, since he seems to lack the competitive edge that the other players possess. His Late Night is a much more laid-back experience, and the impression one gets is that O'Brien and crew are just putting on a show for the hell of it, and they're having so much fun that they don't care if anyone watches.

But that laid-back atmosphere is what makes the show so entertaining, and such a perfect chaser for David Letterman. O'Brien is a grinning, eager kid and his humor is self-effacing to the extreme. Many of his acts are blatant ripoffs of other shows, so obviously doctored that one cannot help but laugh. A typical routine called "Small Town News" included a photo of an "actual street sign" which read "Adolph Hitler" and pointed at an old man in a chair. Typical guests range from Drew Barrymore to dead president William Howard Taft.

Bottom Line: After Letterman, this weird gangly guy is the most consistently funny voice on Late Night.

Pop & peanut butter; 2 boxed sets reviewed

By BRIAN BABINEAU and ADAM GOULSTON

Message In A Box
The Police
A&M Records

Former schoolteacher and balding rock-stud Sting has made a living in the late 80s and the early 90s by putting out albums of fairly good, but mostly tepid pop songs.

This is not to say that I did not get distinct pleasure out of songs like "Fields of Gold" or "All This Time," but there was something too easy about his songs, something a little simple, and henceforth, too boring in their content and sound.

In short, I had certainly lost my faith in the balding, former schoolteacher turned rock-stud. Luckily, Message In A Box has come along to help wash the new Sting down.

The set contains four compact discs chock full of "everything the Police ever recorded," and makes one realize what an incredibly important band the English trio actually were. They were a band in the truest sense, their three separate parts functioning as one punk-ska-reggae whole.

It is startling the way that Sting's agile bass underpins Stewart Copeland's jazzy percussion fills to make the inventive rhythms on top of which Andy Summers lay shimmering guitar chords and arpeggios. Sting's bandmates helped anchor and control many of the pop excesses to which he aspires now.

Message is, of course, brimming with the hits, from the ska-influenced ode to a call girl, turned party sing-along "Roxanne," to the calypso-like romantic revelry of "Every Little Thing She Does is Magic," to their biggest hit, Sting's ballad of obsession, "Every Breath You Take."

Yet, while the hits are well represented, they are not what makes Message so special. It is those previously unavailable cuts, and many live tracks that make this worth owning. "Nothing Achieving," one of their first singles on the independent IRS label, a hard-driving two-minute ditty makes its first appearance on disc.

Live versions of the ubiquitous "Message in A Bottle" and the dreamy "Tea in the Sahara" are also personal favorites. The latter is extended to a near hypnotic length, anchored by Copeland's floating percussion. One of the Police's most popular songs never to appear on an album, the haunting "I Burn for You," also stands out.

I could go on for hours extolling the virtues of the many songs included in this set, from the anthem-like "So Lonely" to the dreamily funky "Walking on the Moon," but I'll stop now.

The Police are one of those groups that everyone grew up with, everyone listened to, but no one knew how important they were until they broke up. Now that we are left with just Sting, it is necessary once in awhile to revisit those days with a song or two from these chaps, something that will help swallow the grunge being forced down our throats by the rock world.

In retrospect, this review shouldn't even be necessary — you know the songs, now go listen to them. B.B.

Annette: A Musical Reunion with America's Girl Next Door
Annette Funicello
Walt Disney Records

When this one came my way, I thought, "hey this is by the peanut butter chick." Oh sure, I'm not so naïve as to completely overlook Annette's history as a Mouseketeer and movie star, but it was the peanut butter aspect of her career that really stuck to the roof of my head.

Thanks to the thorough documentation accompanying this album, I soon realized there's much more to this chick than peanut butter.

First things first. I'm sure you have better ways to spend your money than on the music of a washed-up middle-aged woman trying to milk a few last dollars out of her once prosperous gimick career. It seems apparent that Annette Funicello was the Tiffany of her day. However, for a study of '50s and '60s pop-culture, Annette: A Musical Reunion with America's Girl Next Door, with it's 2 compact discs of 47 songs and a 39-page biographical booklet will suffice far beyond what any textbook or professor can tell you. Annette is as complete as a boxed-set gets.

The very existence of this set brings a slight grin to the face. After all, Annette has little to show for the past two decades other than a series of Skippy or Jif or whatever commercials and that insipid Back to the Beach film. However, a closer inspection reveals the whole story behind a sickly-sweet teen idol. Beginning in the "Mickey Mouse Club" era when the quiet little Italian girl became the star player on America's favorite kids' show, tunes like "Don't Jump to Conclusions" and "Wild Willie" actually do tackle much of the same subject matter as today's sex-centered songs, just in a much more subtle and sugar-coated manner. It's pretty enlightening.

The music is utterly simple and nauseatingly charming. Annette obviously doesn't have much of a singing voice, but with the help of a bunch of echo, she manages to sound greater than her tiny frame.

Through the years, Annette progresses to the "Muscle Beach Party" stage and the days when she and Frankie Avalon were top box-office draws. Again, more simple and, dare I say it, delightful tunes. By reading along in the booklet, you can learn. . .no, wait, what's happening? I'm being sucked in.

OK, fine, so Annette kind of bites musically and she's probably had a lot of plastic surgery and doesn't need the money other than to get new drapes for her dining room, but I got the boxed-set for free. Now I'm going to sell it. As far as I'm concerned, Annette is disgusting and the epitomy of the white-dominated, glossed-over, utterly repulsive wave of government-influenced TV culture that infiltrated the middle of this century and still persists even today.

With that off my back, just remember, this one will make a good Christmas gift for a pair of cheesy parents. Annette Funicello is washed up and repulsive. D-A.G.

THURSDAY

COURTESY WARNER BROTHERS

Bela Fleck & the Flecktones

ART EXHIBIT — "Killing the Metaphor — The Art of Mythmaking" exhibit includes sculptures, drawings and prints by Michael Kuch. These works explore how this artist adapts cultural metaphors to our times. This exhibit will be shown at R. Michelson Galleries in Northampton until Oct. 15.

ART EXHIBIT — Today is the last day to witness in UMass' Wheeler Gallery, the second annual exhibition of art by students in the University's Summer Art Program. "What I Did on My Summer Vacation" is an eclectic blend of multi-media which reflects the diversity and range of the traditional and nontraditional students who created it. Wheeler Gallery hours are Monday - Thursday from 4-8 p.m.

CONCERT — Bela Fleck and the Flecktones will perform at the Academy of Music at 7 p.m. The Fleck-sters are three-time Grammy nominees and purveyors of a remarkable fusion of jazz and world beat, bluegrass and funk. Tickets are $16 and $18.50, available at the Northampton Box Office.

CONCERT — Morphine will play the Bay State Hotel in Northampton at 9:30 p.m. Opening for the band will be Steve Westfield from the Pyjama Slavedancers. There will be a $5 cover charge.

FILM — Emil und die Detektive/ Emil and the Detective. (1931 German) directed by Gerhart Lamprecht is in German with no subtitles. This event is free at Amherst College's Campus Center Theater at 4 and 7:30 p.m.

WILD PARTY — It's the Simchat Torah Bash. Celebrate the giving of the Torah with dancing, drinking, food and fun at the Chabad House at 7 p.m.

FILM — The 1992 film, Sneakers, directed by Phil Alder Robinson stars Robert Redford, Dan Aykroyd and Ben Kingsley. This movie chronicles the escapades of a team of computer hackers. It will be shown free in the Amherst College Center Front Room at 8 p.m.

SATURDAY

CONCERT — Student Valley Productions presents a night of music with Acoustic Panic and Corey Pearlstein. The show takes place at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theatre, and admission is free. Hampden Theatre is located in the Southwest residential area.

Musician and songwriter Brad Potter joins with vocalist Samantha Smith to weave the sometimes eerie, sometimes uplifting soundscapes of Acoustic Panic. They use both acoustic and electric instruments to create their original songs.

FILM/LECTURE — The Woodcuts of Antonio Frasconi will be shown at 2 p.m. in Hillyer Hall, Room 117 at Smith College. At 2:30 p.m. Antonio Frasconi will give a Gallery Talk at the Smith College Museum of Art.

CONCERT — Minibus, along with Monghani and Birthmark, will perform at the Baystate Hotel in Northampton at 9 p.m. Call 584-8513 for more information about this 21+ show.

SYMPOSIUM — Symposium in Honor of Jean Strachan Wilson is open to the public and will be held at Smith College's Alumnae House at 10 a.m. Wilson, a member of Smith College's class of '24 passed away in January. She was a member of Smith's history department for over 41 years. The symposium commemorates her interest in education and teaching achievements. Speakers include Laura Bornholdt, liaison between the University of Chicago and the Chicago public high schools, Lois Green Schwoerer, Kayeser of Professor of Histroy at George Washington University.

FRIDAY

COMEDY — Student Valley Productions presents comedy troupe "Mission: IMPROVable" in a free show at Hampden Theatre. The show starts at 8 p.m. Hampden Theatre is located in the Southwest residential area. Mission: IMPROVable has spent two years perfecting its craft. All scenes and situations are unrehearsed, based on ideas supplied by the audience.

MUSIC — WFCR/88.5 FM broadcasts the Springfield Symphony Orchestra Classical Concert Series with Raymond Harvey conducting. Tune in at 9 p.m.

COMMUNITY — Shabbat Services and Meal will be served at the Chabad House at 7 p.m. The topic will be "Experiencing the Joy of Constant Recreation." Call 549-4094 for more information.

EXHIBIT — Northampton's Words & Pictures Museum has been transformed into the Louisiana bayous, featuring a plant man, better known as Swamp Thing. This marks the first such retrospective exhibit for both the Words & Pictures Museum and the Swamp Thing character.

Originally created by writer Len Wein and illustrated by a master of horror comics, Berni Wrightson, Swamp Thing garnered numerous awards in both the United States and Great Britain. The retrospective will trace this character through concept roughs, sketches and finished artwork including previously unseen stories, to its production as a movie and television series. Call 586-8545 for more information.

COMEDY— Don't miss Tommy Holden as he has the crowd at the Hu ke Lau in Chicopee in stiches tonight. A 7p.m. and 10:15 p.m. show will be performed, call 593-5222 for tix and info.

Hot food and good times in Amherst

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: this is the first in a two-part series dealing with the shops in downtown Amherst.

The folks on North and South Pleasant Street are glad to have you, UMass. From the quaint, relaxing atmosphere of the cafes to the loud, shoulder-to-shoulder action at the bars; from the familiar aromas of the pizza places to the "Jim's Journal" world of Kinko's, the faces that welcome you from the other side of the counter have found serving the college community-to-be, although hectic from time to time, an overall enjoyable and rewarding experience.

I took the liberty of risking life and limb darting back and forth across the street to ask the various operations in the area what it was like to have a shop in the "happy valley," and discovered that the establishments aren't just here to rip your hard-earned money from your hands like many other notable on-campus locations — no names.) They realize what students mean to them, and delight in the pizza-slinging, copy-making, coffee-brewing, drink-mixing, and whatever else-doing they do in "an Amherst day's work."

"There's lots of diversity, which makes it fun and interesting," say Heather Clark and Ann-Mary Cloutier, managers of Bonducci's Cafe.

"College kids are pretty cool, and it's easy to joke with them," they add.

Cosmo Macero, a bartender at Barselotti's, claims that things have changed since he first started pouring the sauce, and as the (in one word) overplayed Spin Doctors' "Two Princes" blare out of the sound system, he explained how. "It doesn't get too rowdy here anymore. The people are pretty well-behaved," he said.

"It's a friendly bunch — for some reason, we don't really attract the fighting crowd, not that I'm saying other bars do."

He also noticed that the doormen do more than a decent job at keeping the fun-loving but nonetheless illegal under-aged drinkers out, adding that 95-100 percent of the mistakes is the "patron doing a good job falsifying the I.D."

Whatever the night brings Macero here in the diverse world of Amherst, he admits it's an enjoyable series of events from A to Z.

"It's a lot easier than before, where it seemed like I was getting paid to throw a party," he recalls.

"Then it got to be a drag. I don't really know anyone here, but when you do, they ask you to do favors for 'em and it's tough."

Macero and doorman Frank Cooper both noticed the huge change in population when the "animals of the Zoo" came back to UMass after a summer of sun and, more importantly, recuperation.

"Students are a big part of this town, and having grown up here, the population almost triples when they show up," Cooper said.

The overall emphasis that the roundup of businesses made was on the proportion of their customers that are from the college-age crowd, and also on how drastically the tempo and volume of clientele goes up when the students arrive and how far it drops when they wave bye-bye for winter, spring, and summer vacations.

"Any business in the area does feel the impact of the students coming and going," said Lois Veshia, manager of Kinko's Copiers, which she says was founded in California by a man named Paul Orfalea almost 25 years ago.

"It's a very interesting clientele because you do such a variety of work," she added.

"Some of what we do is in correlation with something the student has been

TV's best and worst from Columbia, S.C.

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Staff

COLUMBIA, So. Carolina — All you need to know about South Carolina is that CBS' "Late Show with David Letterman" doesn't start until midnight because "Sanford and Son" continues to draw huge audiences from 11:30 p.m. until 12:00 a.m. No joke. With that said, let's take a look at the hits and misses of the young fall season, from the home office in Columbia, S.C.

The hits: As always, Letterman continues to impress. Dave, Paul and the crew have made the switch to CBS without any significant changes, which should be good news to NBC "Late Night" viewers. The show is as solid as anything on the tube, with an always-impressive guest list to complement late night TV's best host. NBC or CBS, he's still the same great Dave.

Over at NBC, Seinfeld continues on its quest to top last season's funniest episode, "The Contest." The cast has been showcased in just about every entertainment publication lately, and t-shirts and greeting cards featuring cast members have been spotted in finer stores everywhere, even in S.C. If this brilliant ensemble isn't the '90's answer to "Cheers," I don't know what is.

While it may be too soon to tell, I'm going to go out on a limb and say that Lois and Clark: The New Adventures of Superman will be a surprise hit. I flipped on the two-hour premiere a few weeks back, and was soon settled in for the night. Dean Cain proved witty and likable as Clark Kent/Superman, and Teri Hatcher showed equal promise as Lois Lane. It's still early, but watch out for this one.

Clinging, perhaps, to my love of the short-lived "My Two Dads," Paul Reiser's latest Mad About You strikes me as a snappy, enjoyable half-hour. Having switched time slots furiously for a couple of years, the 8 p.m., Thursday night show will not change your life, but is worth checking out.

Wanting to leave the list of losers short and preparing years for, like a dissertation. There's a lot of importance and demand for quality involved."

Another place heavily affected by the student population, and with good reason, is the "zone home," D.P. Dough.

"We do mostly deliveries, so our business is mostly students; somewhere around 75 percent," said Dan Haley, manager.

"And it's definitely exciting. There's a lot of energy in Amherst, and always something going on. But business is seasonal, and I like it that way."

Another advantage they delighted in, one that I'll admit I didn't think of, is that having throngs of students so close makes for a greater work force. Also, by having university students as staff, they can relate better to what that age group wants and expects.

"Having kids work for me keeps me in touch with what our market is looking for," said Sue Friedman, owner of Bart's Ice Cream (yes, the one with the miniature cow in the glass case.)

"Our staff is generally college-age people who generate a lot of new ideas for us. We have defined what we offer on what kids have told us they want."

"Most of our employees, like 90 percent, are students," said Clark, "and even when it gets busy, it's still a very relaxed atmosphere. It's a great job. If someone wants to come in and sit down for three hours, they're usually more than welcome to."

Jayne Cayes, general manager of D'Angelos sandwich shops/Chip's Ice cream, noted that although working a flexible schedule around her student employees' classes is laborious and difficult, working with them has been more than a positive experience.

"They add a lot of flavor and personality," she said, even after having had to stop talking for a minute to correct a goof by a new student employee. "You can learn a lot about other peoples' cultures and keep all sorts of people working for you by accepting them for who they are, and you can definitely enjoy it."

For the busyness of the business, the situation differs, of course, from place to place. A bar is obviously going to feel the effects of the large population in the nighttime (or, Miller Time), as are the pizza joints, where the phones are ringing largely with those who've just returned from the variety of watering holes (perhaps all of them) and have a bad case of the munchies.

sweet, I'm only going to mention one that will inflict punishment on the viewer. Any guesses?

If The Chevy Chase Show, new from Fox, makes it to next spring, I'll launch my own talk show next season. The premiere was so bad that I almost felt bad for this guy. Almost. Chase has no feel for a late-night audience, and no charm to speak of as a host. He's a funny man; his films have proven that. However, as a late-night talk show host, he is pathetic.

To avoid this and other television catastrophes, watch Dave, Jay, or Sportscenter, read a book, clip your nails, do anything. You'll thank me later.

Building proposal angers neighbors

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

Allan Carpenter of 40 Fairview Way has lived in Amherst for over 50 years. He said he can remember a time when he could toboggan in his backyard all the way down to the by-pass by Route 116.

Of course that was over 20 years ago and since that time his neighborhood bordering the University of Massachusetts to the north end of the campus has endured much construction and development by the University.

Now Carpenter and other residents are protesting the construction of a new computer science center in their backyard.

The site for the new building is not yet decided, but three locations are being considered: land in the center of campus east of the campus pond, land between Furcolo Hall and Totman Gym off of North Pleasant Street and a parking lot off of Governor's Drive near the engineering and science buildings.

Carpenter is concerned with the latter proposal because he feels his neighborhood has put up with enough building with the Polymer Research Center construction that has been going on for two years.

"We'd like to save our neighborhood," he said. "This is the nicest neighborhood in the area."

Carpenter also complained about the constant noise generated from the Lederle Graduate Research Tower ventilation system.

"It is so bad," Carpenter said, "that in the summertime we can't even have a decent cookout."

In response to an article in the Daily Hampshire Gazette on Aug. 23, Carpenter wrote a letter to Chancellor David Scott expressing his discontent with another building being erected so close to his home.

"We're not against education," Carpenter said. "We know that the university is going to expand." He said the neighborhood wants the university to be considerate of its wishes.

However, the building Carpenter is protesting is still in the earliest stages of development according to Beverly Wood, a member of the building planning advisory committee.

"We are still trying to draft a very detailed plan," she said, "as far as the number of rooms, labs, etc."

The building in question, the Computer Science Research and Development Center is going to be built to house an expansion of the Center for Real-time and Intelligent Complex Computing Systems (CRICCS) according

U.N. report reveals atrocities of Croatian Army

By ONJEZANA VUKIC
Associated Press

ZAGRED, Croatia — The U.N. commander in former Yugoslavia issued a damning report Thursday charging Croatian troops had practiced a "scorched-earth policy" in Serb-held villages and killed civilians in cold blood.

The report detailed evidence of atrocities committed during an offensive a month ago against Serb-held villages in the Medak pocket near Gospic in southwestern Croatia.

"The scale of physical destruction and killing of residents in the area . . . indicates that the Croatian Army practiced a comprehensive scorched-earth policy," said a statement summarizing the report.

In the ethnic warfare that has wracked former Yugoslavia since June 1991, Serbs have been most blamed for atrocities and "ethnic cleansing," - the use of terror, destruction and murder to force out a rival group - although all sides have been accused of such practices.

Serbia is suffering severe economic sanctions for backing Serb rebels in Croatia and neighboring Bosnia-Herzegovina.

But the European Community also has warned Croatia it could face sanctions for attacking Serbs who hold about one third of the state after a six-month war in 1991, and for backing Croat forces in neighboring Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Croats have demanded that the land be returned, and are increasingly frustrated with the U.N.'s inability to disarm the Serbs and organize the return of Croat refugees.

A U.N. official in Sarajevo, the Bosnian capital, released details Thursday of what appeared to be the worst ethnic cleansing by Croats for months in the divided city of Mostar in southwestern Bosnia-Herzegovina. In Bosnia, Serbs, Croats and Muslims have been fighting for 10 months.

The U.N. report on Croatia, approved by Gen. Jean Cot, the commander of U.N. forces in former Yugoslavia, was relayed to Tadeusz Mazowiecki, the U.N. human rights investigator for the region.

In an open letter to Croatian Foreign Minister Mate Granic on Wednesday, Mazowiecki said Croatian forces apparently "arbitrarily executed" several residents of the villages and demanded a full investigation.

The Croatian Council for Defense and National Security, an advisory body to President Franjo Tudjman, said Tudjman had ordered an inquiry and charges would be brought against those responsible. It also asked that all crimes committed during Croatia's six month Serb Croat war in 1991 be investigated, Croatian news reported.

Politicians meet for informal sessions

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

In an effort to bring local business concerns closer to the legislature, business people and state representatives met to discuss the economic situation in the area.

State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst), state Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) and state Rep. Nancy Flavin (D-Easthampton) met with local businesses at Bertucci's restaurant for an informal meeting.

The Amherst Chamber of Commerce coordinated the event which was sponsored by D.H. Jones Realty.

"We came tonight looking to increase business and make some contacts," Steve Lepow of Central Travel said.

The atmosphere made it possible for the legislatures and business representatives to mingle and discuss concerns.

However, not all the people present were from a business. Margot Parrot, an activist in Amherst's politics said, "As a town meeting member, I am interested in the business community."

Each legislature spoke for approximately seven minutes about issues in the legislature or in the area which would be of interest to local businesses.

After the presentations, there was a question and answer period for businesses to make their concerns known or to have questions about a particular bill or activity answered.

Story said she does bring concerns back to the legislature, but she said, "Just because we hear something and bring it back doesn't mean it's going to change."

Rosenberg and Story both emphasized the importance of the University of Massachusetts to the local economy.

"You can't talk about the economy

Clinton deploys troops to end Somalian crisis

By TERENCE HUNT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton told the American people Thursday he was sending 1,700 more troops, heavy armor and naval firepower to Somalia to "finish the work we set out to do." He pledged to end the deployment within six months.

"We started this mission for the right reasons and we are going to finish it in the right way," Clinton said. "If we stay a short while longer and do the right thing, we have a reasonable chance of cooling the embers."

Clinton said the U.S. force needed to be expanded to protect troops already there and to make sure humanitarian missions continued. Counting troops offshore, the reinforcements would double the American deployment to more than 10,000.

If America turned and ran because of the rising death toll, around the world "aggressive thugs and terrorists would conclude the best way to change our policy is to kill our people," Clinton declared.

He said he wanted to call the troops home as soon as possible and was sending diplomat Robert Oakley to Africa to try to find a diplomatic settlement. He said it might take "up to six months" to complete the mission but he hoped to wrap it up before then.

Clinton, sitting at his Oval Office desk, said the 4,700 U.S. troops already in Somalia would be reinforced with 1,700 Army ground troops, 104 tanks and other armored vehicles and, offshore, an aircraft carrier and other naval forces carrying 3,600 Marines.

Clinton also issued a stern warning to Somalia holding at least one American serviceman captive. He declared the United States would hold them "strictly responsible for our soldiers' well-being. We expect them to be well treated and we expect them to be released."

He said he did not want to personalize the conflict, and never mentioned by name Mohamed Farrah Aidid, the fugitive Somali warlord whose forces are blamed for the deaths of American and other troops in Somalia.

Morrison wins Nobel Prize

Renowned author is first African-American recipient

By LAURINDA KEYS
Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — American novelist and essayist Toni Morrison, cited for writing prose "with the luster of poetry," won the 1993 Nobel Prize in literature today for her lyrical accounts of the black experience.

The Swedish Academy awarded the prize to Morrison "who, in novels, characterized by visionary force and poetic import, gives life to an essential aspect of American reality."

She is the first black American to win the prize, worth $825,000, and only the eighth woman to win since it first was awarded in 1901. The last woman winner was Nadine Gordimer of South Africa, in 1991; the most recent American winner was Soviet-born Joseph Brodsky in 1987.

Morrison told the Associated Press she was inspired by "huge silences in literature, things that had never been articulated, printed or imagined, and they were the silences about black girls, black women.

"It was into that area that I stopped and found it to be enormous," she said in an interview in her office at Princeton University, where she has been a professor of humanities since 1989.

Morrison, who was keeping to her teaching schedule today, said she found out about the prize this morning from a university colleague who called her after seeing a television report.

The 62-year-old author was born Chloe Anthony Wofford in the steel town of Lorain, Ohio, the second of four children of Alabama sharecroppers who migrated north.

She made her debut as a novelist in 1970 with "The Bluest Eye," and soon gained attention for her "epic power, unerring ear for dialogue and richly expressive depictions of black America," the academy said.

She followed with the novels "Sula," "Song of Soloman," "Tar Baby," "Beloved" and "Jazz." A play, "Dreaming Emmett," was first produced in 1986, but has not been published.

In her 1992 book of essays, "Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination," Morrison wrote: "My work requires me to think about how free I can be as an African-American woman writer in my genderized, sexualized, wholly racialized world."

Residents become cops with new state funding

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state handed out $5 million Wednesday to 34 police departments for community policing programs that encourage beat officers to get involved in their communities.

Gov. William Weld, along with law enforcement officials and Rep. Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, hailed the program as crimefighting's future. Community policing also involves using youth workers and concerned residents to keep neighborhoods safe.

"With closer bonds to the communities that they serve, our police officers will be better able to hear a faint rumble of trouble before it burgeons into a thunderclap of urban devastation," Weld said.

The governor said the Boston program was modeled after similar, successful initiatives in Houston, Baltimore and Newport News, Va.

Boston received the largest grant, $421,885.

Police Commissioner William Bratton said the funds — dedicated almost entirely to the Roxbury and Mattapan neighborhoods — would be used to train police officers, pay them overtime to patrol streets and set up neighborhood crime watch programs.

Bratton said the arrests of three young men in connection with the slayings of Boston Police Detective John Mulligan and two sisters, 17-year-old Celine Kirk and Tracy Brown, 23, were proof that "partnership and problem-solving can get a lot done."

"This money will go a long way," he said. "It's a much-needed shot in the arm. You better believe it's going to be well spent."

Eighty-three communities applied for the grants. After Boston, Springfield received $406,393; Worcester, $402,385; and Lowell, $391,600.

Bratton said community policing would be an alternative to traditional law enforcement in which officers "do everything," usually in response to calls for emergency assistance.

Information from residents would help them prevent crimes rather than react to them, he said.

Weld called the grant program a "Tom Finneran production" because the House Ways and Means Committee chairman folded the $5 million into the fiscal 1994 state budget.

Weld said he also planned to fund the community policing programs next year.

without talking about the health of the university," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg said the future of the university is promising because of an increased budget which will in turn promote the local economy. He also of state financed research and development project at the university.

One particular project Rosenberg spoke of will involve the university participating in a project to develop a telescope to be built here and assembled in Mexico on site.

Flavin addressed the economic issues of small businesses.

"We're going through the most extensive recession in the history of the Commonwealth," she said. The economic recovery and health of the state will be largely with small businesses according to Flavin.

Story discussed the educational reform bill and the fight needed to sustain the state's commitment to education.

Other concerns Story presented were the health care reform proposed by President Clinton and the stiff regulatory processes imposed by the state.

Global terror strikes women

Women around the world face political violence

By JESSIE DAVENPORT
Collegian Correspondent

"The issue of women and political violence is a story of blood and bones concerning real women and real places" said Jean Elshtain in her lecture last night.

Elshtain, a former professor of political science at UMass spoke of her experiences and interviews with victims of these violent acts.

Although the women she spoke of were from different parts of the world they all shared a common struggle. This struggle is one for peace.

Elshtain spoke of the brutalization and terror in Bosnia. She said it was part of a Serbian war strategy - a known policy governed by the Serbian para-military organization.

She related the situation in Bosnia to that of Bangladesh, where over 200,000 war-time rapes were committed since 1971.

She stressed that these hate crimes have been around for as long as there has been war.

Professor Elshtain reported that approximately 20,000 Muslim women have been raped as a result of the war. She said the act of "ethnic cleansing" appeared to be the war's goal and not it's consequence.

A forty year old Muslim woman interviewed by Elshtain said she had been raped, because she was the wife of a military leader, and witnessed young girls being raped in front of their fathers.

She said these "privileges to rape and plunder" were considered by the Serbs to be the "booty of war".

Elshtain also spoke of the Mothers of the Disappeared (Las Madres) in Argentina. These women found it difficult to find a political identity in a place where no one wanted to get involved with their situation, leaving them alone in their struggle.

These mothers got together and developed a political identity of their own. Through demonstrations and protests, they were given back their sense of identity and peace of mind.

Elshtain discussed women's, (especially mothers') concerns of violence and brutalization here in the United States as well, because of gang violence.

She spoke of Clementine Barfield whose son was killed in a gang fight. Barfield was inspired by the Mothers of the Disappeared to organize a group called SO SAD, Save Our Sons and Daughters, in an attempt to fight gang violence.

"In Detroit the gun has taken the place of the automobile as the symbol of power," Barfield said "I have not done my job and you have not done your's until every child can live in peace."

Elshtain concluded with the message that these efforts should not be brushed off as naive but instead should be regarded as important steps toward the end of an age where we fear for our children's lives.

Cultural event promises food, shows heritage

By FELICIA COUSINS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts India Students Association is presenting India Nite which "is a time for Indians in the United States to come together and celebrate their heritage," according to Ali Mir, one of the organizers.

India Nite is an Indian cultural extravaganza organized annually by the Indian students on campus.

There will be speakers lecturing on Indian heritage, culture and giving a brief overview of their history. There also will be people dressed in traditional Indian garb and different native foods will be served at the dinner.

The money collected at India Nite will be donated to various relief funds and charities to benefit different Indian organizations.

According to Khaleel Ahmed, another organizer, "all proceeds from India Nite are to be sent to a relief fund to provide aid for earthquake victims."

"There are a number of relief organizations such as the Indian Embassy Earthquake Relief Fund, Youth for Unity and Voluntary Action, Times of India Relief Fund and the American Red Cross India Earthquake Relief that are collecting monetary contributions and supplies for the earthquake victims," Mir said.

"Those individuals and organizations interested in aiding in the effort to raise money can get more information from the officers of the India Student Association, who can be contacted through the Graduate Student Senate," he said.

"The collection of relief funds for the earthquake victims will continue throughout the month," according to Ahmed.

The event will be held on Sunday, Oct. 10 in the Campus Center Auditorium at 6 p.m..

The cultural event will be followed by a dinner. The cost of the dinner ticket is $5. Dinner tickets can be purchased from Ahmed at 546-0449 or 545-1943.

Fair in SUB helps fill void for bored students

RSO fair in the Student Union Ballroom

By JESSICA LEAPER
Collegian Correspondent

Classes are well underway, tests have even crept their way into your schedule. You're busy but you still feel like something is missing. Hopefully you made it to the Registered Student Organization Fair held in the Student Union Ballroom on Thurs., Oct. 7.

The fourth annual RSO fair was sponsored by the Student Activities Office and involved 50 of the 200 RSO groups at the University of Massachusetts ranging from the University Production Company (UPC) to the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance (LBGA). The purpose every fall is to increase membership and answer questions new students may have after the organizations have a chance to get the old memberships together.

"The RSO fair recruits and gives information to the student body. It enables students to explore options for extracurricular activities," said Nathan O'Leary of the Student Activities Office.

The groups are so diverse that there is something for everyone. According to O'Leary the RSO Fair makes it easily accessible for students to make a connection with the organizations.

The groups themselves find the fair a rewarding experience due to the opportunities to promote their organization and increase their numbers. UPC is one of the organizations that has benefited from the fair this year and in years past.

"We've had a lot of interest all day. Many people know what UPC stands for but have no idea what it takes to put a show on. We are here today to answer questions and if they are interested to have them sign up," said Matthew Faerber, a sophomore communications major and UPC member.

There was more than just information available to the continuously roving crowd. Some activities included a scavenger hunt for free T-shirts, cotton candy and raffle prizes donated by the RSO's involved.

If you missed the fair and would like information on various RSO groups, contact the Student Activities Office and get involved.

Lesbian activists planning visit to Northampton

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

The Lesbian Avengers, a New York based direct-action group focused on issues of lesbian survival and visibility, will be in Northampton early next week.

Concerns about an anti-gay referendum in Lewiston, Maine prompted novelist Sarah Schulman, one of the founding members of the Lesbian Avengers, to suggest a Freedom Ride to call attention to the proliferation of anti-gay initiatives on ballots across the country.

"We called this a 'Freedom Ride' as a tribute to the earlier civil rights movement to end segregation," a Lesbian Avengers "spokesdyke" for the group said. "Freedom rides were used as a direct action tool with activists travelling across state lines to challenge unconstitutional segregation laws and to register voters."

She stated the goal of this Freedom Ride is "to help organize against the grassroots activity of the Christian Right and to emphasize the need for national gay rights legislation."

Northampton is one of five stops the Lesbian Avengers will make on their bus ride to Lewiston, Maine. They will reach Northampton on Sunday, Oct. 10. They will also hold individual workshops and actions in conjunction with local organizations in Boston, Burlington, Vt., Albany and Syracuse. The Lesbian Avengers will hold a visibility action on Monday, Oct. 11 in downtown Northampton to celebrate National Coming Out Day. It will be followed by a forum and the screening of two videos about the Christian Right.

"Across the country the Christian Right is proposing ordinances that violate the basic civil rights of lesbians and gays. We believe people should be informed about these limits to their personal freedom and help fight the Christian Right instead of reading about these ballots in the newspaper after the fact," said a Lesbian Avenger "spokedyke".

The Psychology behind the Citibank Classic Visa card, and the emotional security of the Photocard.

The Citibank Classic Visa instills in students feelings of safety, security, and general wellness not unlike those experienced in the womb. Therefore, it is the mother of all credit cards. ¶ Some experts attribute these feelings to the Citibank Photocard, the only credit card with your photo on it. A voice inside says, "This is me, really me." (As opposed to, "Who the heck is that?"—a common response to the photo on one's driver's license.) It's an immediate form of ID, a boost to your self-image. ¶ Of course if your card is ever lost or stolen and a stranger is prevented from using it, you'll feel exceptionally good (showing no signs of Credit Card Theft Nervosa). ¶ Other experts point to specific services, such as The Lost Wallet™ Service that can replace your card usually within 24 hours. Or the 24-Hour Customer Service line, your hotline, if you will, for any card-related anxiety whatsoever. ¶ Further analysis reveals three services that protect the purchases you make on the Citibank Classic Visa card, at no additional cost. 1. Buyers Security™ can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase[1] (preventing, of course, Insecurity). 2. Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ allows one to extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.[2] 3. And Citibank Price Protection assures you of the best price. You need only see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150[3] (hence no Post Purchase Depression). ¶ Special student savings are particularly therapeutic. There's the free Citibank Calling Service™ from MCI to save up to 26%[4] on long distance calls versus AT&T.[5] (You're encouraged to call Mom and Dad regularly preventing Parenta Non-Supportus.) And a $20 Airfare Discount[6] on any domestic flight. (Case studies indicate that a Fear of Flying is overcome when Spring Break in sunny Florida is a possibility.) Not to mention the low variable interest rate of 15.4%[7] and no annual fee for college students. ¶ Suffice it to say, you'll have a credit card you can depend on while building a credit history. So call 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19, to apply over the phone (students don't need a job or a cosigner) or to have your photo added to your Citibank Classic Visa card. ¶ If we say that a sense of Identity is the first component of the Citibank Classic Visa card, a sense of Security the second, and a sense of Autonomous Will from your newfound financial independence the third, don't be crazy...Call.

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Nothing gets to the heart of a matter like a slap

You are at a party. You are minding your own business. Perhaps you are worrying about your hair. All of a sudden, a drunken fool spills beer all over your brand new cardigan. Next day you are in the library, cramming for an exam. The exam could be the difference between graduation and a career as a plumber. Some jerk is going to great lengths to pick you up. He wants to show you his sexual hardware. What these people need is a good slap to the head.

Wouldn't it be great if you could just haul off and whack someone desperately in need of physical harm? Instead of being charged with assault, hitting someone would be as common as a handshake or a wave. Hey, fists were made for swinging. People everyday are just begging to be knocked around. What we need is adoption of a Shannon Doherty code of etiquette, "Get on my nerves, I get in your face."

Do I advocate unlimited violence? No. It would be more like an allotment of violent acts, say 10 slaps a week, four punches a month, a killing a year — the details aren't important. There are a few problems with maintaining a set of standards for violent activity, but they can be solved once the country's best minds give up on health care.

The important thing is that loosening the assault laws would give people an outlet for their valid aggressive feelings. Hopefully, giving people a little violence will discourage them from committing terribly vicious acts. Better a punch than multiple stabs with a machete, that's what Mom always said.

A.J. STEWART

Hillary Rodham-Clinton has stated that on her next voyage to Atlantis, she'll bring along the topic of violence. Apparently she is trying to rid us of our most basic, human need. Let the record show I am aggressively pro-violence. We need more violence on T.V., not less. I want to suggest an all violence network, chock full of car crashes, murders and war movies. The Dirty Dozen. Apocalypse Now. Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Give people something more interesting than the Care Bears.

People who play football or who play policeman in L.A. may give out enough beatings; but the rest of us hold them in. We deny the human urges, trying desperately to conform to the law and to be good citizens.

We hold back until one day we eat the Eskimo pie that pushes us over the edge. We become serial killers, axe murderers, or stunt men. This doesn't have to be.

Violence and aggression are as natural as smiling and kissing. In this world, where everyone must love everyone else, who will love the violent people?

We should say yes to more violence on T.V., in board rooms and at the school yard. While we're at it, we should bring back public executions. Televise them so kids can watch true criminals (such as tax attorneys) die instead of being subjected to those sissy afterschool specials. Personally, I think criminals should be drawn and quartered. Instead of horses we could use race cars. Imagine the beauty of a body snapping in two, blood showering the crowds, and the splattering of organs across the ground. All to be replayed in super-slow motion. Who'll need football?

I firmly believe the problem of violence is not with our fantasies (as portrayed on T.V. and film), but with out realities. These sensible, yet simple, steps should be taken to bring mitigated terror to our streets. Really, why should criminals enjoy all the therapeutic benefits of punching someone's lights out? So the next time your professor runs ten minutes over class time, or the lunch lady serves scrod yet again, don't despair. Give 'em a slap.

A.J. Stewart is a UMass student.

An exhibitionist's desire

As I've grown up I have always found it helpful to set goals for myself. I have short term goals, like getting an A on my next political science exam or getting a date with the cutie in my journalism class. Of course there are also the long-term goals, like securing the presidency or marrying a supermodel. Right now, my immediate goal is to land a spot on the next season of The Real World.

Surely you all, as young Americans, are familiar with the show. It being either your second or third favorite piece of MTV programming, depending of course on your feelings about Cindy. If Beavis and Butthead are MTV's answer to The Simpsons, then The Real World is its answer to Cops. Much more intense than high-speed car chases, MTV has Generation Xers living their lives. This stuff is deep.

For those cable illiterates among you, The Real World is, "the story of seven strangers, picked to live in a house, and have their lives taped to find out what happens when people stop being polite and start getting real." The first season's cast lived in New York City, home of the hapless Mets and the one and only Howard Stern. I guess the producers thought better after that, because for the second season, the folks at MTV told the new cast, "California's the place you oughtta be," so they packed up the production truck and moved to Beverly Hills that is. Or someplace near it. Next season, my season, we're headed to the Bay City, the heart of the 60's protest movement, and this time around the revolution will be completely televised. San Francisco here I come.

Some, like my roommate, wonder why anyone would want to have a camera following them around every minute of the day and night. Are you kidding me? Think of the possibilities. You could institute the instant replay rule the NFL used to have. "What's that Joe, you think I left the lights on all day? I think they're checking on that in the booth...oh, I'm sorry, looks like we have a reversal," or, "I'm sorry officer, I really think I was only doing 55, and so does my cameraman here."

Being on TRW would be a great way of meeting people. When someone sees you on TV, they feel as if they know you. Imagine, the next time I go to the grocery store the checkout lady might say, "and Derek, you really could be more considerate to your roommates, next time wash the frying pan after you use it." Or one day I'll be wasting away the hours in Haight-Ashbury and some groovy chick will come up to me and say, "Hey man, that was a total downer how your roommate broke your Janis Joplin 8-track."

As if that's not enough, my dear Mom would be in Heaven because she'd always know what I'm up to. Just think of the long distance phone savings.

Right now you're probably saying, "OK Derek, I'm convinced. Being on The Real World sounds pretty cool, but why would they want you?" It's true, I don't have a Marky Mark physique (Eric), I've never written for Rolling Stone (Kevin), rapped with KRS-One (Heather), had my jaw wired shut (Tami), or been a struggling musician or actor (just about everyone else), but I have lots of other interesting things going for me.

Number one, I'm from Massachusetts. Our state has been sadly and noticeably under-represented on The Real World. We've produced 4 Presidents out of 42, but of the 16 Real Worlders to date, none has been from the Bay State. Our time has come.

Secondly, I would just be gosh-darned entertaining. You don't have to be an aspiring rock star to be cool. Imagine the excitement level of the home audience watching me pour coffee and make copies as I fulfill my duties as an intern. Now, kissing up to the boss, that's the real world. Better yet, think of the entertainment value of the televised high-jinks as I teach my new roomies how to spell and pronounce my last name. Names like mine are very real. You can't make that kind of stuff up.

Ah, San Francisco would be a great place to live. I get chills at the thought of seeing Mullin, Hardaway, and Chris Webber on the same basketball court. I've always wanted to ride the cable cars, and I might even acquire an appreciation for The Dead. Above all though, San Francisco's appeal to me boils down to just one thing: all the Rice-a-Roni I can eat.

Fraternity responds to article

After reading you article published on 10/5/93, I was confused about the night in question. The night that I witnessed was completely different from the night described in your article. As the official spokesperson for the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity I am writing this letter not to beat a dead horse nor to stir up a situation already put to rest, but to apologize for the whole situation.

Your reporter, as well as my fraternity, was informed that the judicial hearing was a closed meeting. For that reason, we had not brought witnesses, nor was your reporter admitted; therefore your reporter wrote a story from Theta Chi hearsay. We support this new Judicial Board set up by the Intra-Fraternity Council, however we feel as though the sanctions against our house (750 hrs. comm. serv., 4 alcohol workshops, 2 weeks social probation, and weekend patrolling of the Greek area) are unnecessary and unfair. By sanctioning Theta Chi with 1,000 hrs. community service and Sig Ep with 750 hrs., the IFC is only sending a message to the whole Greek area that next time you should fight back. For defending our own home and not fighting back, our house received a sanction similar to Theta Chi. Our fraternity has traditionally had great Greek, university and community relations. We will now be working with the system to properly appeal this sanction.

Observing Nat'l Coming Out Day

For those of you that don't know, UMass will be observing National Coming Out Day on Wednesday, October 13. What is National Coming Out Day, you might ask? It is the official day when all gays, lesbians and bisexuals celebrate who they are openly in public. It is a day when those of us who are out all the time encourage others who are not, to join us.

Next Wednesday is also the legendary Jeans Day. Surely you have all heard about the homophobic conservatives who tear through their closets looking for skirts, corduroys, suits — anything that isn't denim. They have to make sure that people won't think they support gay rights, or even worse, that they are gay themselves.

Among the events scheduled for the 13th are the rally on the Student Union Steps at noon and the Speaker's Bureau at the New Africa House at 7 p.m. The Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Counseling Collective, the Program Office for GLB Concerns and the Lesbian, Bisexual Gay Alliance are among the organizations sponsoring these activities. For more information, please call the LBGA at 545-0154.

So pick out your best jeans for next Wednesday and come on over to the Student Union steps, because as a friend of mine once said, "If you can't come out fighting, then fight to come out."

Deven DeMarco
Social Chair, LBGA

to Richard Adrion, the director of computer science.

CRICCS is a center for research which may be applied to commercial use. Industries come to the center with problems that can possibly be solved through the research done by the center.

For example, Adrion said Lotus Software Company used the center's research to access information more quickly in order to better address the needs of users of their 1-2-3 software. At the time, the center was doing research on rapid access of information which it could apply to Lotus' needs.

The Applied Computing Systems Institute of Massachusetts, Inc. (ACSIOM) is a non-profit orgranization that licenses commerical use of research done at CRICCS.

The building will be paid for as part of the $200 million bond put up by President Hooker's office and the state for repair. Adrion estimates the building will cost $15 million and hopes that construction will begin by next summer or fall.

"We are trying to get the center built within two years," Adrion said, "but there are still a lot of bureaucratic issues to overcome."

Jamie Chernoff, the director of University Relations has discussed construction plans in the past with Carpenter.

"We intend to involve the neighborhood" in terms of the site and its impact," she said. "This neighborhood has been subjected to a lot of construction."

Wood said the conflict with Carpenter right now is due to a "premature article" in the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Carpenter said the article on Aug. 23 led him to believe it was "a done deal" and wanted to voice his opinion which is why he already wrote the letter.

"The university is a burden to the town, but the town has no say in its character," he said. " There is no character built into the campus to make it architecturally beautiful"

Carpenter said the university owes it to the town to listen to his complaints because the town has to provide fire and police protection, but the university only gives the town tax money when it is "convenient."

"We are trying to be good neighbors," Chernoff said.

Rocking M Ranch to offer terrifying tour

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Driving through the outskirts of Charlton, Mass. is a scary thing at night. Spread-out houses and sparse signs of civilization make what I am sure is a perfectly peaceful, normal town seem freaky once the sun goes down.

Add one haunted forest, one month prior to Halloween to the picture, and you have the ingredients for a screaming good time via the Rocking M Ranch, sponsor of this ghoulish guided witch tour/theatrical spectacular.

"Neewollah, stealer of souls, the King of slime and slish, commands the act of mutants, maniacs, mummies and machines, ALL your worst nightmares, future, past and between," the folks at the ranch promise. Indeed, you feel yourself trying to grab hold of your soul, or at least the closest person to you, driving past the Charlton Hotel (a creepy place sure to have made Norman Bates feel quite at home,) and into the ranch entrance.

Once you have driven under a large spider web and parked your car (saying goodbye to your beloved vehicle/emergency shelter,) the sweet smell of hay overcomes you and almost makes you feel safe. Almost.

Assorted creatures emitting a slew of noises tend to creep up to the unsuspecting viewer of a dance performance put on by local teens from the Terri Gordon Dance Center in Sturbridge. As the 10-17 year-olds perform to hits like "The Monster Mash" and "Batman," you may find yourself in the company of some pretty weird spectators, like sludgy beings warning "Don't go into the haunted forest!"

Once you take the plunge and follow your cautious guide into the forest, your courage is again tested by a chorus of screams and the ever-pressing darkness. Within the course of approximately two hours you witness 15 battles against Neewollah's vicious minions that constitute the war that Good (you) wages against Evil (Neewollah.)

You and the other 15 or so people that somehow get sucked into this whole ordeal eventually become active participants in the battle against the Soul Stealer, working your way through the "Maze of Cruelty" together, encouraged by your underdog-guide who keeps reminding you, "Hold hands, only by staying together will we survive."

Throughout the forest and accompyanying haunted house, themes of sticking and working together are reinforced.

"There is an undertone, certainly of this (peacefulness) in light of the spooky, Halloween overtone," claims Al Rubin, the co-owner of Rocking M Ranch.

Rubin also says that the script for this holiday entertainment was written to carry with it a deeper message.

Robert DeNiro's Bronx Tale is a tale well told

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

There's something peculiar residing in the "Mean Streets" that make up Robert DeNiro's directing debut, A Bronx Tale. Lurking in New York's urban jungle circa 1960, amid the casualties of raging racial tensions and gangland slayings, DeNiro mines a curious ore, unearthing a rarity to these streets and to the gangster genre itself. Amidst the chaos, DeNiro finds heart.

A Bronx Tale is the story of Cologeno seen at ages nine and 17 (played by Francis Capra and Lillo Brancato respectively). It's a tale of divided loyalties. On one front stands Lorenzo (Robert DeNiro), Cologeno's blue collar bus driver father desperate to impress upon his son a moral framework. Standing at odds with Lorenzo is Sonny (Chazz Palminteri), the local crime boss who becomes surrogate father to Cologeno after the boy refuses to identify Sonny as the assailant in a murder just beyond his neighborhood stoop.

But A Bronx Tale seeks beyond potential melodramatic trappings. DeNiro and screenwriter Palminteri aren't interested in a simple quest for Cologeno's soul. Rejecting "Goodfella" posturing, they opt to capture a slice-of-life of the "Old Neighborhood," a neighborhood where doo-wop tunes drifted through the summer air and stickball was the big-ticket event for twilight.

As usual, De Niro's acting amazes. Lorenzo is a new persona to De Niro, who plays him as a hard-working yet loving husband and father. His character is more integral in the early scenes involving Cologeno's youth as he tries to lay the groundwork for his son's moral upbringing. He knows the temptation that the neighborhood wiseguys present to his son, but he labors to overcome them.

Still this isn't the rough DeNiro of earlier efforts. With his prejudices, which come to light in Cologeno's teenage romance of a black girl from a rival neighborhood, DeNiro's performance speaks of reality.

Screenwriter Chazz Palminteri fares impressively in his portrayal of Sonny. He's the real star here, with DeNiro wisely choosing to avoid spaghetti-soaked stereotype. Palminteri's "Goodfella," is just that. Like Scorcese's gaggle of gangland characters, Palminteri's crimeboss shoes are laced with cement and grounded to the earth. There's no gravel-voiced cat petting Mafioso in Palminteri. His Sonny likes to avoid smoke filled offices and as he explains to Cologeno; sticks to the streets in case of trouble. As the film advances, Sonny becomes an amicable character who like Lorenzo, has his faults. Palminteri wisely plays this character like the Bronx streets, enchanting yet brimming with violence and distrust.

DeNiro knows these streets well, for the Bronx is his neighborhood. With loving detail DeNiro paints the Bronx with nostalgia. From the belligerent elderly proprietor of the horse-drawn fruit cart, to the sixties hits emanating from Chez Bipp, the local mobster watering hole and Sonny's stomping grounds, the Bronx becomes an enchanting place.

Its easy to understand why at age nine, Cologeno would be so hard pressed to deny his father and journey beyond its stoop. All around him was excitement. To Cologeno, Sonny is a rebel without pause. He has the nice car, the wads of cash and the big gun. He's the epitome of a pre-pubescent religious enlightenment.

With A Bronx Tale, DeNiro has fully complemented his career. Though the Scorcese influence is evident; especially in the frenetic camera work that establishes the film's violent outbreaks, DeNiro's work comes completely from his heart and his love (and respect) for the New York streets. Solidly crafted and enriched by great performances (as the adolescent Cologeno, Lilla Brancato boils over with youthful exuberance), its a tale well told and one worth listening to. A "Human kindness and human ability can overrun all of this (fear)." Rubin also asserts that the script encourages "the spirit of the group."

The first performance of Neewollah's Haunted Forest was given only one year ago, constituting the early efforts of the tour, which was created within the framework of a five-year plan.

"We are still playing to a backyard audience," Rubin says, "but a lot of thought went behind this whole thing, much more than simply slapping two sticks together."

With a cast of actors that range from local folks to professionals from Boston, an amazingly scary set, lighting, costumes, music, props and some great screaming going on, the ranch is indeed on its way to becoming a first-rate, outdoor theatre event, unique to any other.

So if you are looking for a spine-tingling way to spend Halloween, or feel like celebrating this ghoulish holiday any time during the month of October, the Rocking M Ranch is definitely worth checking out. Just be sure to wear warm clothing, bring a lot of courage and energy, and be careful to notice a good place to get some coffee, hot chocolate and piece of warm, indoor security after the show.

Shop owners discuss students

Local proprietors debate pros and cons of clientele

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: this is the second in a two-part series dealing with the shops in downtown Amherst.

Or how about services like Peter Pan bus lines? They feel the crunch come vacation-time; in other words, business isn't as regular as, say, Antonio's, who are simply mobbed every day and night.

Peter Pan's shift manager Douglass Bell and Hasting's clerk Tom Wheaton, in fact, were the only two individuals who had anything to say that constituted as negativity or ill will toward their college-age patrons.

"Most of the businesses I know of have a love-hate relationship with students," Bell said. "But they bring a lot of money to the community." He added that while business is sporadic nowadays, as soon as the classes let out, "the phone just doesn't stop ringing."

Wheaton has a different story to tell. He is a 1986 graduate of UMass, with $15,000 worth of debt to prove it. The "rich brat" type doesn't go over too well with him.

"Working with the college clientele has its moments. It's fun sometimes helping people get adjusted," he states. "But I've noticed people are often getting a little ruder. Students seem to have a lot more money; many seem already set for life. It's discouraging."

But that's not to say he doesn't recognize the rewards of the college life or those who take pride in it.

"It's kind of interesting to see all the classes come back, get more mature, and talk about getting their careers on track."

The vast spectrum of interests and diversity of taste of the University's thousands are also an asset to the numerous shops. It enables them to expand their merchandise and services, knowing full well they'll have a buyer for whatever kind of item it is, no matter how exotic or outlandish it may seem in other areas.

"In a college town, we can be more successful to cater to a wider range of interests rather than to the tried-and-true formulas we use elsewhere," said Scott DiBerardino, manager of Showcase Comics. "Although we have the regular superhero comics, we can carry ones that aren't so mainstream because we live in an area that isn't mainstream."

"Some of the titles and series we sell here are considered bizarre and warped in other places—or not considered at all," he added.

Creativity and imagination abound on a campus, and are a fundamental cog of existence, no matter what the major. Thus, it's reflected in the community that surrounds it as well. Just about every establishment has that "something extra" in both its layout and in the goods they offer. The atmosphere is one of relaxation and acceptance. Just by stepping through the door you know you'll discover something to fit your preferences.

"Earthy-crunchy Amherst' is definitely a stereotype," Cloutier said. "Whoever you are, you'll fit in."

"You get to meet people with various talents and needs," says Elisa Katzlanders, employee of Design Supply Studio. "There are a lot of interesting, creative people out there, and by working in an art store in a college town, I get to meet them."

But then summertime calls and the streets begin to thin out a bit and quiet down. Backpack-donning figures roaming the streets for that one last bargain are harder and harder to spot. The businesses don't need to know when vacation officially starts to be able to tell when students have begun packing their bags and splitting. Many miss the faces that frequent their shops after a hard day of taking notes, insanely boring lectures, and studying (in most cases).

"I have a lot of fun on busy nights. I see a lot of people I know and I know they have a good time," said Scott Pascoe, bar manager of Delano's restaurant. "I imagine most of the other bars rely on the students. This past summer was a little better than most, although it's still like a ghost town; the opposite of Martha's Vineyard."

It's good, it's peaceful, and it's necessary to take a break from the daily rut of bookwork, studying, and stress that being an elite college student can bring. Go grab a cup of coffee, a slice of pizza, or just take a walk around. Try something different; something foreign to your normal routine. College is supposed to be a learning experience, and it is so in more ways than one. Whatever you do, the folks in Amherst are waiting to help you find what you're looking for (more than I can say for Whitmore).

Perhaps Mark Wootton, owner of Wootton's Books, sums it up best.

"That's exactly why I came here: the colleges. It has the advantages of a small town and a city at the same time, with many cultural opportunities. I think it's a safe environment, and I say that after just having one of my windows broken by a student late at night. I don't condemn a whole group. There are large partying crowds and that can be discouraging for those not part of the party, but it's good and relaxed for the most part."

Quote of the Day

"It is the friends you can call up at 4 a.m. that matter."

– Marlene Deitrich

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An attractive member of the opposite sex is eager for a commitment. You may not be ready! A close friend helps you reach an important decision. Your spirits soar.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A trip could provide a wonderful diversion today. Both business and romance beckon. A phone call brings good news from a faraway loved one. Give a partner a second chance.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Self-doubts disappear when you end a second-class relationship. Put your needs first for once. Use your great inner strength to pursue your goals with confidence.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A one-on-one meeting may not be as much fun as joining a group. New friends help you and your mate loosen up and relax. Do more socializing as a couple.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A tense alliance may not be worth all the stress it causes. A party or movie will help you relax. The love boat could enter an exotic part of it all tonight.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The load you have been carrying may suddenly seem too much to handle. Set chores aside while you relax and recharge your batteries. Take an armchair trip — read.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Look for constructive ways to chase away the blues. A regular exercise program will work wonders! Greater candor will improve a parent-child relationship immeasurably.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Romance is in the air. A major change could occur in a primary alliance. Be more tolerant of other people's foibles. Faraway, exciting developments are taking shape.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Unwind at home this weekend. A rich appreciation of life and an invigorating sense of freedom give this day a rosy glow.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Creative outlets such as art and music pump you up. Entertaining your co-workers proves both fun and smart. Postpone a big-ticket purchase until you have more money in the bank.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): An aura of success surrounds you now. You know this and speak with self-assurance. Your upbeat mood is contagious. Romance will heat up if you take the lead.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A day for long walks and great talks. Materialist become annoyed if a friend hangs around too much. Take the hint. Remember, three's a crowd when it comes to romance.

UMass C-C heads to Pa.

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

After a week off, the University of Massachusetts men's cross-country team gets back on the trail Saturday at the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, PA.

As the sight of this years NCAA's, the invitational will include 12 of the top 34 teams in the nation. The race will prove vital for teams in search of an at-large bid in the NCAA's.

Head coach Ken O'Brien is not weary of the tough competition. He intentionally schedules meets with top opponents to strengthen his team. "I'd like it like this every weekend," he said.

O'Brien doesn't believe that the week off will hurt his team. "It generally plays well," he said. "It gives an immediate return and pays dividends later."

UMass will again be led by Ethan Nedeau, the team's top finisher in the first two meets. Nedeau was selected as the Atlantic-10 Performer of the Week last week and O'Brien believes Nedeau is the team's top runner.

"Ethan Nedeau is our No.1 runner," he said.

O'Brien is still searching for others to narrow the gap between Nedeau and the rest of the UMass squad. "We're searching for two runners to join him," he said.

O'Brien said the freshman runners seem to have taken the challenge to run with Nedeau as evident by Matthew Behl's seventh place finish against Vermont and Boston University, a performance that won Behl the Atlantic-10 Freshman of the Week award.

O'Brien is anticipating a real dog fight on Saturday and believes a finish in the top 15 would put Umass on the doorstep.

"I think that this team is getting ready to do that," he said.

O'Brien views the invitational as an opportunity for the team to refine its mechanics and concentration as they prepare for upcoming meets. "This is the meet to take the next step," he said.

The Paul Short Invitational will feature all the excitement of the NCAA's and O'Brien knows it. "The kids are ready. I hope we get swept up in the excitement."

Kelly and company have a huge statement to make this Monday night, and for their sake, you better hope they don't spot the Oilers another 35-point lead.

As for my prediction, it's obvious. A blowout. A debacle. Andre Reed touchdown. Thurman Thomas busts one up the middle for 80 yards, touchdown. Kelly to Metzellaars, good for six.

Did I say how much I love the Bills? Buffalo 45, Houston 17.

Bill "Do I get royalties, Jim Bouton?" Balfour, a Pigskin Picks correspondent, said he is ready for the Dolphins to roll over Cleveland this week.

"Forget about it. Marino is going to tear it up. Cleveland? Come on," said Balfour.

Hey, the team with uglier uniforms than the Patriots is 3-1. Cleveland's defense is downright nasty, and the Browns probably will make the playoffs. How can you rely on Vinny Testaverde to come in in the second half and bail you out?

Last season Bernie Kosar played on a broken ankle and almost pulled one out against the Fish. Not this year. Miami 20, Cleveland 14.

The Patriots and the Cardinals, 4 p.m. on Sunday. Be there. Are you excited? Didn't think so.

New England ran ads in the Globe with a photo of Drew Bledsoe and a caption, "Are you ready for the season?"

I guess not. I think Parcells and company are getting ready to win. At some point.

Not this week. Regrets go out to my other Picks correspondent, Mike Reiss "Pieces", but chalk up another loss. Garrison Hearst will have a big day. Phoenix 13, New England 12.

Did you see that?

• Channel 5 - Boston broadcasting the BC-Rutgers match-up instead of the college football No. 2 game of the year Miami vs. Florida State. Who is the dunce?

• Gatorade — the drink for when you are feeling unmotivated.

• Scottie Pippen and his best Jordan impersonation with the shades on at the press conference. He was probably hiding the tears because he realized it is all downhill from here. Sorry, Scottie, no more superstar to leech off of.

season's UMass-Hawks game), where women's soccer is the biggest game in town.

"We'd love to host the tournament," Hartford Coach Austin Daniels said. "But we'll have to earn it over the next couple of weeks. Starting (tomorrow)."

Hartford downed UMass twice last season and return the physical and dangerous Daley (seven goals), a preseason All-American, and Reifer, who has knocked in 13 goals from the midfield position. Freshman Stephie Chmura is a front runner who has added six goals.

"Offensively, they are as good as we play," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "Daley can lull you to sleep and then strike for one, and Reifer just keeps running from the midfield."

Rudy is unsure if his senior sweeper and captain, Paula Wilkins, will see action. Wilkins missed yesterday's 6-0 UMass' drubbing of Yale, with a pulled hamstring.

"Paula is a very influential player," Daniels said. "She controls the team from the back and can break up the attack."

Hartford was caught looking too far ahead yesterday, when they were beat solidly by Providence, 2-0. UMass defeated the Friars 1-0 last Saturday.

"This will be a very hard game," Daniels said. "Nothing different than the usual UMass-Hartford game."

SPORTS NOTICE

• The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team won their match against Vermont Wednesday night at the Curry Hicks Cage, 3-2. Rene Ingoglia happy to be Minuteman

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

"I'm getting back to what I used to be," said University of Massachusetts fullback Rene Ingoglia to coach Mike Hodges after a practice this past week.

Ingoglia is referring to his high school days, where he was named First Team All-Northeast as a junior tailback at Bishop Kearney High School in Rochester, N.Y.

A time where Division I-A schools were coveting the services of Ingoglia and hoping he would choose their University. A time where the Penn States, the Boston Colleges, the Syracuses, and the Wisconsins were calling Ingoglia on a regular basis. A time where the 17-year-old Ingoglia possessed unlimited potential.

Ingoglia had not even entered his senior season, and already, he had a good idea of what he was going to be doing upon the conclusion of high school. Knowing that it was imperative for him to stay healthy in order to play on the Division I-A level, Ingoglia just wanted a successful, injury-free season.

"The biggest thing was senior year, I wanted to play hard and not get hurt," Ingoglia said.

Not to be. Ingoglia injured his left knee during the second game of his senior season. Major knee surgery was required, ending Ingoglia's season.

Not only was Ingoglia's knee shattered, but his hopes of playing Division I-A football shattered, also. The powerhouses that stayed in touch with Ingoglia heading into his senior season would not take the chance on him. The chance that Ingoglia would not regain his form that attracted them in the first place.

So, the Rene Ingoglia sweepstakes shifted gears. What were the Penn States and Boston Colleges turned into some local Division III schools and one Division I-AA school.

Ingoglia, not interested in the Division III schools, had two options. One was to attempt to walk on to a Division I-A team. The second was to enter the University of Massachusetts to play for the Minutemen. Ingoglia chose the latter just one week before the signing period deadline.

"After the injury, I put everything into perspective," said Ingoglia. "The way I was looking at it, it was still Division 1 football. It's a great brand of football. I couldn't even count how many players on this team could be playing for big schools. Guys on the offensive line, (UMass linebacker) Mario Perry; tons of guys. The level here is great."

Ingoglia, a shifty back in his high school days, spent a good two years, including his redshirt 1991 season, adding strength to his frame. Ingoglia also concentrated on learning to run with more power because of the difference in speed between high school and college ball.

Ingoglia's hard work paid off last year as he exploded for 656 yards on 152 carries in just eight games to win the 1992 Yankee Conference Rookie of the Year. Ingoglia also led the 7-3 Minutemen with seven touchdowns and 42 points.

This year has been even better to Ingoglia. In his first four games, Ingoglia has gained 556 yards on the ground, including a career high 204 yards on 22 carries last week against James Madison University. All of this after switching to fullback from tailback, a position he has played his whole football career.

"He's as good as they get at this level," said Hodges. "He's really an excellent player."

For his effort against JMU, Ingoglia, who also scored four touchdowns, swept the top three weekly awards available to the top Division I-AA player in New England, including the Coca-Cola Gold Helmet Award as the New England University Division 1 Player of the Week.

Questions of "what if" may float around. What if Ingoglia did not hurt his knee? What if Ingoglia went on to play Division I-A ball? These questions are irrelevant.

Rene Ingoglia is a UMass Minuteman.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore fullback Rene Ingoglia garnered three major awards for his performance last Saturday: Coca-Cola Gold Helmet Award; YanCon Offensive Player of the Week; and ECAC Co-Offensive Player of the Week.

Minutewomen face tough road test at Hartford

STEVEN PEDULLA / COLLEGIAN

The 10th ranked University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will have its hands full tomorrow when they travel down to Hartford to face the No. 4 Hartford Hawks.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

When the schedules come out for women's college soccer, fans in the North quickly circle three dates on their calendars. They represent the days the three giants of the region — Massachusetts, Hartford and Connecticut — play each other.

The first of those dates is Saturday (noon), when No. 10 Massachusetts (8-2-1) travel to No. 4 Hartford (9-2).

The three programs have so completely dominated the region over the past five seasons, that every other regional game is little more than a tune up for the Big Three. Each match-up whether regular season or in the NCAA Tournament, is pressure filled and remembered for years to come.

Each victory is reveled in, boasted about and used in the recruiting battles.

This season is more of the same. Hartford, who defeated UMass to advance to the Final Four last season, still has its potent offense, with power forward Rose Daley and the big play kid, Jessica Reifer, who is just a sophomore.

Connecticut, ranked No. 8 nationally, is solid as usual and led by the mistake-free play of probable All-American midfielder Karen Ferguson.

UMass still has the air-tight defense, now anchored by Heidi Kocher, Paula Wilkins and Amy Trunk, who play in front of the region's top keeper, Briana Scurry.

The regular season is for bragging rights, confidence building and earning home field advantage. And this season, the home field is even more important. The NCAA Tournament will expand to 16 teams, four from each region. The top seed in each region will host the two day, regional tournament.

Make no mistake about it, the Road to the Final Four will run through either UConn's beautiful soccer stadium, UMass' natural amphiteatre of Garber Field or in front of the boisterous Hartford crowd (2,200 witnessed last

Men's soccer hopes to produce

Tournament bid on the line against GW and WV

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

It's time for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team to produce. The whole season is on the line this weekend. A team that was once a lock now needs to fight their way into the Atlantic 10 tournament.

The Minutemen face must-win situations as their record has slipped to 2-8, including a dismal 1-3 in the A-10. George Washington comes calling on Friday and West Virginia on Sunday. The three teams are battling for what is likely the final spot in the tournament.

Last season West Virginia defeated UMass in a penalty kick shoot-out for the Atlantic 10 Championships. This was after the two teams evenly battled through a scoreless tie for regulation and two over time periods.

"We've played well the last four games, controlling play, we just couldn't score," said UMass Coach Sam Koch. "We had Temple beat last Sunday — wish the game had ended 10 minutes earlier," Koch said.

The team has lost five in a row, including the 4-3 loss last Sunday in which Temple scored three times in the last 10 minutes.

"If we can cut down on the mistakes but play with Sunday's intensity we should be fine," said Koch. He went on to say "We are very fortunate to still be in it considering the way we've played."

George Washington has beaten UMass the last couple of years, including last season's controversial rain postponed game in the nation's capital, a game the Minutemen were leading but lost two weeks later in its continuation.

Adding to the fire will be the match-up of UMass' forward Randy Jacobs and GW's Marcelo Valencia. Valencia was last season's A-10 Player of the Year despite Jacobs having scored 10 more points, including eight more goals.

"They'll be two good teams on the field on Friday, GW is on a roll with two straight wins," said assistant coach Rob Donnenwirth.

Koch is still undecided as to which goaltender to give the starting nod to. Mark Wolf absorbed the tough Temple loss, and freshmen Brackie Reyes has also seen action recently. Koch stresses this weekend's importance.

"We need huge crowds, we need all the support we can get for these important games."

This is the last chance for this talented Minuteman team to turn around this season, according to Koch.

Picks: Week six

Overall record: 7-4.

In a week that has seen the sports world lose three of its biggest names ever, it is no surprise that the National Football League will be counted on to pick up the pieces (well, along with the Phillies vs. Braves).

What is more frustrating is people like Dave Krieg, Eric Dickerson, and Bubby Brister will never leave, even though you want them to. Some things just aren't fair.

Art Stapleton's PIGSKIN PICKS

As Nolan Ryan, George Brett, and Michael [insert sniffle] Jordan leave the sports pages for now, here's to hoping names like Joe Montana, Dan Marino, and Troy Aikman never do.

So the pigskin beat goes on . . .

I got a call on my voice mail accusing me of being biased against the Bills, and always picking the Patriots. I don't think that I need to justify my hatred for Buffalo once more, but for someone to think that the Patsies are my team of choice. Well, that's ridiculous.

O.K., my friend from Western New York, Jim

Report finds problems in Mullins design

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

University officials made public on Friday a report finding fault in the structural safety of the Mullins Center.

Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance, said the Mullins Center does not meet code requirements to safely withstand certain wind and earthquake conditions. Page issued a report focusing on the structural integrity of the building. The Daily Hampshire Gazette cited the 150-page report which said the facility is not designed properly to withstand wind levels over 55 mph.

Zallen Engineering of Framingham, an independent consulting firm, was hired by the state Attorney General's office to conduct a review of the building. Allegations about the building having faulty structure surfaced last January and February.

Zallen, in a letter to the University, said he does not see a need to close down the facility at this particular point. Zallen's report cited problems with the design, not the construction, of the building. In the report, Zallen pointed to what he feels are deficiencies and made some recommendations. There is no required action.

"The threat of an earthquake is quite minimal," Page said. "It's a very low probability."

According to Page, the University of Massashusetts Building Authority has hired Simpson, Gumpertz and Heger, also an engineering company, to review the state's report.

"They have already been on site, and they feel that the connections in Mullins are capable of withstanding winds up to 70 mph," Page said.

There is no official report yet, Page said, and they need more time to review the point concerning earthquakes.

"The focus of analysis has nothing to do with construction," Page said. "We have a difference of opinion, though, at this point."

The report is expected to be complete by Oct. 21, the date the World Wrestling Federation is scheduled to come to Mullins.

Weidlinger Associated of Cambridge completed the design for the Mullins Center. A spokesman from Weidlinger declined to comment to the Gazette on the matter.

According to Page, Weidlinger is a well-regarded national firm. He said as part of the process of building Mullins, the University engaged another highly regarded national firm who approved the design before UMass went to bid.

John Fish, president of Suffolk Construction Co., the general contractor for Mullins, told the Gazette in a statement that the construction of the facility was done "exactly according to specifications and was approved by all parties involved."

If the report is found to be accurate, and the design is determined to be faulty, Suffolk Construction stands ready to assist in every way possible to help correct the situation, Fish told the Gazette.

Page told Mullins employers that if they are concerned about their safety, they should make it known. The University will try to accommodate them by reassigning them jobs outside the structure.

Cease fire holds in Somalia

By REID G. MILLER
Associated Press

NAIROBI, Kenya—Following a show of force over Mogadishu by U.S. warplanes Monday, the U.N. special envoy to Somalia welcomed a cease fire by the militia of clan leader Mohamed Farrah Aidid.

The comment by Jonathan How, a retired admiral, was relayed to reporters at a briefing after Mogadishu ended its third night without attacks on fortified U.N. positions around the city.

"We welcome all overtures of peace and stability in Mogadishu, as we have seen them in the rest of the country," How's statement said. His spokesman, Farouk Mawlawi, said he would not elaborate on the envoy's words.

Fighting between U.N. peacekeepers and Aiddin's militiamen has been largely confined to the part of Mogadishu controlled by Aidid. Leaders of the other 14 main factions generally are cooperating with U.N. forces elsewhere in rebuilding the nation after a devastating civil war and famine.

Aidid reportedly announced the suspension of attacks in a radio broadcast Saturday. The move was timed for the Sunday arrival of President Clinton's envoy, Robert Oakley, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said he did not know specifics of the discussions.

American F-18 Hornet fighters and A-6 Intruder bombers roared low over the seaside capital Monday.

Before dawn, U.S. AC-130 aerial gunships fired their radar guided cannons at mock targets in an unpopulated area near the city.

Burhan Mohamed Nur, a spokesman for Aidid, described the overflights by the jets and the target practice by the AC-130s as a provocation. A three ship U.S. Navy amphibious battle group carrying 1,750 Marines moved though the Suez Canal on Monday heading for Somalia. The force is part of the reinforcements being sent to Somalia to give U.N. peacekeepers more fire power until the March 31 deadline.

Oakley reportedly met with the commander of the Nigerian U.N. contingent on Monday. The United States and Nigeria each have on soldier being held by Aidids militiamen. Aidid spokesmen have said the American, Chief Warrant Officer Mike Durant, would not be released until the United Nations freed 32 Somali prisoners including four key aids of Aidid.

Durant was captured during the battle Oct. 3 that akilled at least 17 American soldiers and wounded more than 70. Aidid said 315 Somalis were killed and the Red Cross put the figure of Somali wounded at 700.

U.N. Secretary General Boutros-Boutros Ghali said Sunday that African, Arab and Muslim leaders would meet with him on Oct. 20 in Ethiopia to seek a plan to prevent Somalia form collapsing into any after U.S. troops withdraw.

Boutrous-Ghali fears Clinton's plan to pull American forces from Somalia will lead other countries to withdraw their U.N. contingents as well. There are 29,103 peacekeepers from 33 nations in Somalia.

Minutewomen upset Hartford

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts field hockey team reveled last week in its 2-0 defeat of national champion Old Dominion University, this past weekend the UMass women's soccer team answered Pam Hixon's squad with its own upset of a top ranked team.

Massachusetts 3
Hartford 0

In fact, it did the field hockey team one better, if possible, by thoroughly dominating then No. 4 Hartford, 3-0, in West Hartford.

The Reds (9-2-1), now ranked No. 7 nationally, played the defensive game of their lives, despite lacking their top defensive player, senior sweeper Paula Wilkins, who missed her second straight contest due to a pulled hamstring. The defense was so stifling that the powerful Hartford offense was unable to get one shot off in the second half.

"This was a big win," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "It was a satisfying day for our entire team."

Offensively, UMass scored three times within a five minute stretch in the first half. Three goals were the most scored against Hartford all season.

The game winner came from Heidi Kocher in the 14th minute on a penalty kick se:-up when Nicole Roberts was dragged down in the penalty box. Kocher went to the right of Hawk goal keeper Kim Early for the goal.

At 19:01 UMass struck again when

Scientists win Nobel

Two revolutionized RNA splicing

By KEN GUGGENHEIM
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Philip A. Sharp and Richard J. Roberts' discovery of RNA splicing 16 years ago revolutionized genetics, and led to spinoff work that earned Nobel Prizes for other scientists.

On Monday, they won their own. The two were named co-recipients of the Noble Prize in medicine and will share the $825,000 prize.

"It felt good this morning, folks," Sharp said at a news conference hours after his wake up call from the Nobel committee in Stockholm, Sweden, informing him of the award.

Sharp, 49, a Falmouth, Ky. native, heads the biology department at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Roberts, 50, a native of Derby, England, works at New England Biolabs in Beverly, Mass. The two knew of each others' work, but weren't collaborating when they make their discoveries.

Their work changed scientists' understanding about DNA makeup in cells and helped launch the field of biotechnology.

In awarding the prize, the Nobel Assembly of the Karolinska Institiute, said Sharp and Robert's research "has been of fundamental importance for today's basic research in biology, as well as for more medically oriented research concerning the development of cancer and other diseases."

"Everybody thought that genes were laid out in exactly the same way, and so it came as a tremendous surprise at the time," Roberts said in an interview. "No one had anticipated that it was...one of the discoveries that come, really, once in a lifetime, where dogma is completely

UMass Professor Named to National Committee

A University of Massachusetts professor of geology and geography has been named to the chair of the National Research Council's Committee on Flood Control Alternatives in the American River Basin in California.

Professor Rutherford H. Platt, who was invited earlier this year to review draft amendments to the National Flood Insurance Program, will serve as chair from September 1993 to March 1995.

The function of the National Research Council is to advance science and its uses for the public good.

UMass Faculty Search for Medicinal Plants in Ecuador

Two UMass faculty members, a staff person and a Holyoke science teacher braved unfriendly tribesmen, poisonous snakes and deadly quicksand in the rain forests of Ecuador to collect plant samples that may be useful in treating or curing disease.

The area they chose to conduct their research was in the eastern part of Ecuador. The area is inhabited by the Waorani, a tribe known for killing outsiders.

However, with the help of their Indian guide they were able to collect 37 plant specimens, bark and soil samples which will be tested to see the potency of their medical qualities.

The group included Linda Nolan, associate professor of public health; Abel Ponce De Leon, associate professor of veterinary and animal sciences; Simon Zatykra, technical specialist in the School of Public Health and John Roth, a botanist and Holyoke teacher.

UMass Engineering Students to Build Bridge for Amherst

UMass engineering students will build a footbridge across Mill River to replace the existing one which is 22-years-old.

The project will be undertaken by the University chapter of Tau Beta Pi, an engineering honor society.

The bridge will connect the Mill River recreation area to the conservation area in North Amherst. Construction of the bridge is expected to take about six weeks.

Amherst Conservation Commission Director Peter Westover arranged for the town to appropriate $2,300 to the project.

Westover said he was happy the UMass students offered to build the bridge because the town of Amherst couldn't afford to hire workers and build the bridge on its own.

"In these trying financial times, it would have been very difficult for the town to hire people to design and build a new bridge to replace the rotting one," he said. "So it was a welcome surprise to have Tau Beta Pi's offer to do the project."

Management Guru to Speak at Mullins Center

The author of In Search of Excellence, the top selling management book of all time, will speak at the Mullins Center on Oct. 28 at 7:30 p.m.

Author and management guru Tom Peters, who heads The Tom Peters Group/On Achieving Excellence in Palo Alto, California, is known for his support of free markets and his cynicism towards inflexible managers and bureaucracies. He is a proponent of cooperation in the workplace and continuous improvement in organizations.

Peters will donate all proceeds from the event to the UMass School of Management's Production and Operations Management Program.

Tickets are on sale at the Mullins Center Box Office and at all Ticketmaster outlets. General admission tickets are $10.

UM prof. to receive history award

By DARIENNE HOSLEY

ARAM COMJEAN/COLLEGIAN
Steven Oates, the University of Massachusetts history professor, won a distinguished history award.

University of Massachusetts history professor Stephen B. Oates, who has spent the last three years defending his biography of Abraham Lincoln from plagiarism charges, will receive the 1993 Nevins-Freeman Award from the Chicago Civil War Round Table this Friday.

The award is given annually to a historian in recognition of lifetime achievement for historical writings on the Civil War.

Oates, who has taught at the University since 1968, said he is honored to receive the award named for "two of the greatest Civil War historians ever," Allan Nevins and Douglas Southall Freeman.

"They [the Round Table] told me they would have given [the award] to me anyway, but it was also their statement to my tormenters," Oates said.

He has published 15 books, including To Purge This Land With Blood: A Biography of John Brown and The Fires of Jubilee: Nat Turner's Fierce Rebellion.

With Malice Toward None: The Life of Abraham Lincoln was published in 1977, but came under scrutiny three years ago when an Illinois professor accused Oates of plagiarizing from a 1952 Lincoln biography by Benjamin Thomas.

Twenty-three Lincoln scholars and the University of Massachusetts cleared Oates, and the American Historical Association released an ambiguous statement that stopped short of the word "plagiarism."

But two scientists at the National Institute of Health added a twist to the debate last March when they announced that their computerized "plagiarism machine" detected 175 similarities between the Oates and Thomas biographies.

The new claim sparked debate over the definition of plagiarism, but no further action was taken on the charges. Oates strongly denied the accusations.

A 1981 recipient of the University's Distinguished Teacher Award, Oates was named silver medalist for national Professor of the Year by the Council for Advancement and Support of Education in 1986 and 1987.

He was a consultant for Ken Burn's PBS series "The Civil War," and will appear in a documentary on John Brown scheduled to air this month on the Arts & Entertainment channel's "Civil War Journal."

The Chicago Civil War Round Table lists more than 400 scholars, writers and Civil War buffs among its members. It is the oldest and largest of approximately 200 Civil War round tables nationwide.

When he receives his award in Chicago this Friday, Oates is expected to give an acceptance address based on his forthcoming book, A Woman of Valor: Clara Barton and the Civil War.

Employee brightens UM store

WEINSTOCK/COLLEGIAN
Sybil Eschbach is well-known for her friendliness in the University Store

By NICOLE BURKE
Collegian Staff

Although the University Store in the Campus Center may be the busiest place on campus, one can always find friendly service and a bright smile from Sybil Eshbach, a 26 year seasoned employee.

Eshbach works behind the front counter near the store's entrance as the charge department supervisor.

"I don't know how much I make a hour," Eshbach said. "I only work here because it's fun and the people I meet are terrific!"

Eshbach was born and raised in Rochester, Mass. After attending Wareham High School, she continued her studies at Simmons College in Boston majoring in home economics and graduating in 1942.

While teaching grammar school in Carver, she met Charles Eshbach and they were married on September 27, 1943. He graduated from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in 1937 and was editor-in-chief of the Collegian.

"The Collegian came out weekly then," Eshbach said. "It was one sheet. And, folded in half it equaled four pages."

The couple moved to Amherst in 1964 with their three daughters and one son.

Activist fasts for 12th straight day

Vietnam vet calls Columbus Day "blasphemous"

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

A noted peace and justice activist will fast on the Amherst South Commons for the 12th consecutive day today to protest the United State's celebration of Columbus Day.

S. Brian Wilson, an attorney and Vietnam War veteran, is part of a nationwide effort to rename Columbus Day to Indigenous People's Day. Wilson said this year's fast, which ends today, is the continuation of a 42 day fast held in Washington D.C. last year.

According to Wilson, the U.S. observance of Columbus Day "applauds an attitude and pattern of limitless greed, domination, exploitation and a superiority complex."

"The fasting is an expression of my own outrage that we celebrate Columbus Day when Columbus brought to the old world greed, exploitation and suffering at the expense of the Native Americans," Wilson said.

Wilson has also participated in active protest of U.S. intervention in Central America. In 1987, he founded the Veterans Peace Action Teams, which worked in the war zones of Nicaragua and El Salvador.

As a member and founder of the Nuremberg Actions, Wilson attempted to stop a train in Concord, Calif. filled with weapons from traveling to what he believed to be civilian targets in Central America. The train cut both of his legs off below the knees. Wilson also suffered a severe skull fracture and a brain injury.

Wilson said the public fasting is his way of getting people to think about what it means to celebrate Columbus Day.

"I want to provoke some memory of what Columbus Day is," he said. "When we celebrate Columbus Day we are celebrating 501 years of genocide, slavery, exploitation and destruction. Celebrating Columbus day is blasphemous."

Wilson has an autobiography, On Third World Legs, which was published in English in 1992 and in Japanese in 1993.

Editors rewrite history

Updating the reference of the world

By MICAEL BEZDEK
Associated Press

BOSTON—With the world map in flux, the editors of the Columbia Encyclopedia's latest edition found themselves trying to pin down history as it happened.

Their entry on the USSR begins, "It was established on Dec. 30, 1922, and dissolved on Dec. 31, 1991."

The single volume encyclopedia, now weighing in at 11 pounds and 3,072 pages, has been the first reference and reality check for millions since its debut in 1935.

Using what editors Barbara Chernow and George Vallasi call "guerrilla research" — fax transmissions, telephone interviews and computer aided cross-referencing — the couple rewrote 60 percent of the entries from the fourth edition, published in 1975.

In the midst of their four-year task, they watched much of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union undergo deconstruction.

"It all happened so fast," Chernow said. "We had to see how the dust was settling, but we had to get information as soon as possible."

In rewriting history, Chernow and Vallasi follow tradition.

Over the decades, editors have made way for sculptor Henry Moore, poet Marianne Moore and actress Mary Tyler Moore by banishing English painter Albert Joseph Moore, archaeologist Clarence Bloomfield Moore, Irish novelist George Moore, and several more Moores.

Long gone is the haunting 1930s-era entry on Jews: "German's 500,000 have probably been somewhat reduced since the advent of Hitler."

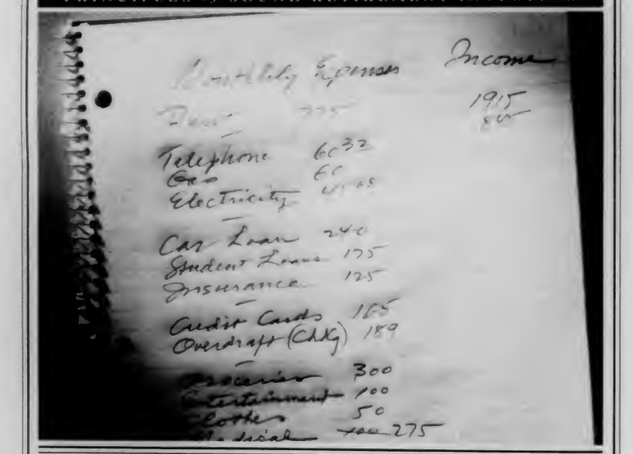
An early account of Gen. George Armstrong Custer described the Indians slaughering his troops at Little Bighorn. The current Custer entry refers to his massacre of Native Amercians at Washita.

Fifty years ago, Abner Doubleday was called "the originator of American baseball." Today the encyclopedia notes that was a myth, a title bestowed by a turn of the century commission and "based upon a single, unsubstantiated letter from an elderly man who later died an an insane asylum."

Along with earthshaking events, routine items became fodder as well.

"I couldn't see things on television or in the newspaper without saying to George, 'Does it belong in the encyclopedia?'" said Chernow.

"I would see a building and wonder if we should include the architect."



In a telephone interview from their New York office, the editors said they hoped a new generation would come to rely on their encyclopedia (Houghton Mifflin, $125), due in bookstores in two weeks.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax-deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $154,031* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $211 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research put TIAA-CREF at the top of their list for retirement planning. Why not join them?

Call today and learn how simple it is to build a secure tomorrow when you have time and TIAA-CREF working on your side.

Start planning your future. Call our Enrollment Hotline 1 800 842-2888.

Trying to make the world a safer place for a smile

"Do you ever smile at people?" she once asked me.

"Of course I do," I replied.

"I mean just smile at people that you walk by."

"Occasionally."

So why was it such a shock to me when I sat on my stool in front of a computer terminal in the Amherst College library, this completely random pretty girl walked by and smiled at me?

Why did I repeatedly ask myself, "Why did she smile at me when I didn't smile at her?"

Does she smile at everyone? If so, why?

Why did I forget to smile back?

I concluded she must not be from around here.

The act of smiling really isn't that difficult at face value. It sounds like Mr. Rogers propaganda, but it takes less muscle contractions to smile than to frown, never mind a fully developed scowl. You just spread your lips and, to coin a phrase, Whoomp! There it is! (And, that will be the last time I ever say that).

Thanks to this little part of the human body, you can completely brighten someone else's day. But as in the case of this Amherst girl you can also throw someone else's day completely out of whack. My little excursion to find books on Upton Sinclair had evolved into a full-blown self-analysis.

I soon made peace with myself.

I've tried it before; just smiling at random faces. Getting on the elevator in my building, if there's only one or two others in there, I smile — rather more of a grin — but only if they're girls. If it's a guy or guys, I remain solemn, like a real man should, right? (Maybe, if I'm really feeling manly, I'll grab my jock or something.) I mean just imagine the implications if I smiled at a guy. I'd be queer.

Adam
GOULSTON

So basically, I'm a sexist, biased pig who smiles at girls in elevators. Cool, I can live with that. But if I try this approach in the halls of crowded buildings, forget it!

So I absolutely cannot smile at guys. That's just wrong! But in the halls, if I smile at random girls, it almost never fails that they look away. They must think I'm hitting on them or that I'm some kind of psycho. So, I'm a sexist, biased psychotic who hits on random girls. Granted, that's a bit unnerving.

In other parts of the country, it's a common practice to meander down Main Street throwing friendly smiles at pretty much any Joe or Jolene. Wyoming folks are like this. There was a time when it shocked me that my friend from Wyoming used to wave at everyone on the road in a town in which he didn't even live. Then I realized they were waving back and usually smiling. It was a perfectly natural act. It made me all warm and furry inside.

The Northeast equivalent of this is a glance and a blunt, "'sup?" or if you're lucky, you'll get a "hey, what's up?" What is that worth? Around here the act of smiling isn't a natural behavior and I'm as much at fault as the next guy. I don't even usually try anymore.

It's like if a completely random person walked up to me and proceeded to swab my ears. If this was natural, I'd thank them wholeheartedly for the cotton swabbing and continue on my way. But seeing this isn't a common behavior in our society, I'd probably be thinking, "this is odd, a random person is swabbing my ears, I wonder why."

Smiling at a chance person around here, is like swabbing their ears.

Here's my gripe/prayer for humanity — I want to be able to smile at anyone I want (guy or girl) and get a smile back, or at least not feel like a jerk in doing so. I don't want to feel like something miraculous has happened when a random Amherst girl smiles at me. Maybe then we can progress to Q-Tips.

Legislating influence

The House of Representatives adopted a small measure last week that will change the entire ideological direction of the United States, gain the minority Republican party a great deal of strength in the legislature, and in fact turn the country back to a path toward the right.

This was all done by an obscure congressman named Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.), in response to what he calls the "dictatorial" control of the House by the Democratic leadership.

Peter
ORVETTI

Inhofe's measure will make public the names of representatives signing "discharge petitions", one of the many loopholes used to insure passage of legislation that is not popular with the entire legislature.

Here's how it works. If a majority of the House, 218 members, sign a petition calling for a vote on a bill, the bill is removed from deliberation by committee and comes up for a vote by the whole house. In the past, though, the names were kept private until the 218th signature was obtained. Now, they will all be public.

So what is wrong with that? It is just information that the public deserves to have, right? Not entirely. Since the names were kept private before, there was no way for members of Congress and talk show hosts to strong-arm reluctant representatives into signing.

So Inhofe went to the hosts and to Ross Perot, and persuaded them to join his fight. Now, the status quo is thus: If a petition on, say the balanced budget amendment is brought up, and only 100 or 150 representatives are willing to sign it, Ross Perot and his ilk will rant and threaten unwilling representatives to sign.

Certainly enough will be afraid of losing the next election to add their names, and the 218 mark will be easily obtained.

Again, what is the problem? The problem is that a discharge petition takes legislation from committee and brings it up for a vote. Committees exist to study legislation and deliberate on it, then to decide whether or not to recommend it for passage.

The members of committees become experts on their issues, and are therefore better informed to decide than just any representative. Issues that sound good to the public — a balanced budget amendment, restrictive trade policies, and such — that are really quite harmful will not be given the study that they deserve.

Whenever a member of Congress sees a committee headed toward a decision with which he or she does not agree, a petition will be started.

When others are reluctant to sign, the representative will call up Ross or Rush or Larry. Millions of angry letters will pour into Congress, the petition will pass, and the bill will come up before the whole House for vote.

A little more pressure from the radio will pass it into law — without consideration, deliberation, or discourse.

Most of these "hot-button", sound-good issues are conservative in nature. Most of the talk shows are conservative. Jim Inhofe and the Republicans are conservative. Are you beginning to see a trend here?

The vote on Inhofe's measure passed the House 394-40, because of heavy pressure from the talk shows and the followers of Ross Perot. The wide margin was built on our legislators' fear. This is the same fear that has stripped power from the elected leaders of Congress and has handed it to Rush Limbaugh.

Of course, you won't hear about any of this on the radio.

Excavation might be alright but verbal abuse went too far

I am writing in response to Jamie D. Bearse's "Plans to excavate UMass" [Collegian, Oct. 7].

Bearse's article started off as a somewhat humorous proposal to level Orchard Hill. But the piece quickly deteriorated into a tirade of abusive and stereotypical remarks directed at Butterfield and its residents.

Realistically speaking, I understand there are some students here at UMass with shallow perceptions of their fellow students.

But I am disappointed that one such individual is an Student Government Association Senator.

In your article Jamie you related yourself to Jack Nicholson's character in A Few Good Men. Do you remember what happened to Nicholson's character at the end of that movie?

I don't want you on any wall, Jamie D. Bearse, and the students you represent as a senator don't need someone like you looking out for their best interests.

Catholicism doesn't hinder rights

This is in response to Joy Collin's column. "Catholicism's doctrines hinder women's rights" [Collegian Oct. 7]. First of all, Catholicism does not hinder anyone's rights because every person is free to either reject it or accept it. Catholicism is a set of teachings. These teachings suggest ways for people to live their lives. Nobody is ordered to follow them. Catholic doctrine itself points out that everybody is free to decide whether or not to live by it's teachings. Even Ms. Collins herself states that she was raised Catholic but chose to "divorce herself from this religion."

The column criticizes, for one thing, the church's teaching against premarital sex, arguing that there are Catholics who do engage in premarital sex. OK, so there are but does that fact that some people ignore advice necessarily mean that the advice is bad? Besides, there are many who do follow it.

The column mentions the problems of: the swiftly spreading AIDS virus, rampant sexually transmitted diseases, and increasing numbers of unwanted pregnancies. But for us people who choose to follow the teachings of abstinence, AIDS, STDs and unwanted pregnancies are not a problem at all (although we are concerned for others who do face these problems).

We have chosen to take control of our bodies in a way that (1) keeps us safe, and (2) puts a stop to unwanted pregnancies and the spread of horrible diseases like AIDS. And what possible harm are we doing anyone else by the way we have chosen to live? On the contrary, we are helping society by keeping ourselves from adding to these problems and also by showing that there is a real-life way to stop these problems.

Considering the emphasis Ms. Collins puts on the problems of disease and unwanted pregnancy, I am puzzled that she does not approve of the reasonable teaching that Pope John Paul II offers, teachings that many of us follow (you probably saw scenes from Denver).

Instead, she promotes the use of condoms, to protect against AIDS. Personally, I would not want to have sex at all with someone who might have AIDS, letting only a thin piece of rubber come between me and a deadly disease. The Catholic teaching on this issue makes good, safe sense.

Coffee shops provide sweet atmosphere

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

Tired of staring at the same four walls of Ye Olde Dorm Room? Ready to kill your roommate? Want to find an alternative place to study than the library? If you answered "yes" to any of the above questions and like hot beverages and/or food, you are in luck because the Amherst area has some of the coolest coffee houses this way north of New York City.

Before I begin I would like to say that I have no intention of critiquing establishments; that's not my purpose here. My intention is to share with others a list of places that I have discovered, frequented, and grown to love over the past three years. So if you are new to the area, or just looking to find a new place to go hang here's a few places to check out. In Amherst:

Bonducci's, 63 S. Pleasant St. (across from the Amherst Common), is a versatile cafe with its church-pew seating from one to four people. Serving flavored coffees daily, an array of herbal teas, sinful deserts, as well as other eats. You will hear a versatile mix of music ranging from Arrested Development to Bonnie Raitt to Stevie Wonder at this shop. This is the ideal place to read the Sunday paper and munch on a scone.

If you are looking to satisfy your sweet tooth, go to Bart's, 103 N. Pleasant St. This is more of a place to socialize, but you can study here too at more off hours. Featuring homemade ice cream, you can get specialty drinks like Mochaccino, Hot Fudge Madness, and Hot Vanilla here. Also, go and see Bart's cow.

Coffee lovers will be in heaven when they hit the Pioneer Valley Coffee Co., across from Bart's. This is an out-of-the-way place, although it is in the middle of town, where you have a choice of condiments for your java, ranging from nutmeg to cocoa as well as a rainbow of Torani syrups. This is a place for serious coffee and serious studying.

If you haven't found the best deli in town, you haven't found the Black Sheep, 321 Main St. With homemade breads, deserts, and salads, as well as great coffee, this spot will not disappoint any palate, even the most discriminatory. Besides the eats, the Black Sheep Cafe features various musical performances every weekend.

In Northampton:

The Hay Market is the "Stay All Day Market". Actually a used book store, this shop with its nooks and crannies to sit in serves Industrial Strength Coffee Cake as well as cafe au lait that is good enough to skip the sugar. With choices of seats ranging from tables and chairs to old sofa chairs, if you don't have reading to do, you will find plenty of it here with books categorized by subject.

The Coffee Connection, 211 Main St., with its art deco interior and airy atmosphere can only be called elegant. Each brew has its roast date on the bin, and they sell various mugs, espresso sets, and machines in order to enjoy this God-sent beverage.

The Montague Book Mill is located about 15 minutes from campus. With great java and delicious deserts, enjoy your reading in a pocket someplace in this old mill or if it is a nice day sit on the patio, overlooking the waterfall.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

A student enjoys a cup of java in the campus center. As the weather gets frosty and midterms quickly approach, more of us are opting for a hot cup of that yummy, liquid caffeine as a warm snack or pick-me-up.

Arafat gains precious ally

By Salah Nasrawi
Associated Press

TUNIC, Tunisia — Plo chairman Yasser Arafat gained an influential ally Monday in efforts to get the Palestine Central Council to endorse a peace accord with Israel.

Farouk Kadoumi, head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's political department, set aside misgivings about parts of the accord and joined Arafat in urging the council to endorse it.

The pact gives Palestinians a measure of self-rule in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho, with their powers to be spread over a wider area pending the outcome of talks in the next three years.

Terms of the accord require approval by the Palestine National Congresss or parliament in exile. The 107 member Central Council is a policy making body and its approval is preliminary to adoption by the much larger congress.

Radicals within the PLO oppose the accord because it fails to deal with the status of Jerusalem or guarantee the right of refugees to return home.

"This was the maximum we could get under the current international circumstances and because of Arab weakness resulting from the Gulf War," Arafat said Monday in urging the council to endorse the accord.

"This is the first state, it is an essential step upon which we will build our independent Palestinian states," he said. "Those who reject it should understand that our next generations will have to continue the long march."

Despite opposition from hard-line Palestinian factions, Arafat is expected to win backing for the Sept. 13 accord.

Haitians resist U.S. aid

Army backed mob chases personnel

By ED McCULLOUGH
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — Army-backed toughs wrecked plans for American troops to land Monday as part of an international peace mission, drove away U.S. diplomats waiting to greet them.

The band of 25 to 50 men then beat up merchants in the nearby market and fired guns while roving through the capital. No casualties were reported.

U.S. and U.N. officals said the disturbance would not halt the overall peace mission. It was another direct challenge by the military to the U.N. efforts to restore democracy to Haiti.

Monday's landing was to begin in earnest the peace mission to restore democracy and rebuild the economy. About 100 other U.N. personnel are already in the country to do advance work.

The White House delayed the deployment of nearly 200 American military medics, engineers, and civil affairs specialists aboard the USS Harlan County, an amphibious landing ship anchored 800 yards offshore. There was no word on when the troops might dock.

Port officals supported by the the Haitian military blocked the Harlan County's docking by moving another ship to berth at 10 a.m. Monday.

Gurards at the dock refused to let Vicki Huddleston, deputy cheif of mission at the U.S. Embassy, enter the gate, and police stood by or blocked traffic while a group of shouting Haitians filed off a bus.

Described later by a trembling Huddleston as "a group of gangsters, a group of thugs," the men shoved diplomats and reporters gathered for the scheduled docking, then punched and kicked their cars as they fled.

"We don't foreigners coming here and trying to tell us what to do!" one man screamed. Another shouted, "We're going to do do to them what they did in Somalia!"

Haiti's military is betting the international community does not have the will to force it from power. The military seized control two years ago by overthrowing President Jean Bertrand Aristide, Haiti's first freely elected leader.

Aristide is widely popular with Haiti's poor masses, and there is overwhelming support among ordinary Haitians for a U.N. peace plan that would put the traditionally repressive military back in the barracks.

"We know that the majority of the Haitian people support" the U.S. presence, U.S. Embassy spockesman Stanley Schrager said just before the shouting gang forced Amercian officials to leave the dock. "I think it's pretty clear that the people who don't want this [democratic] process to go forward are small, violent minority."

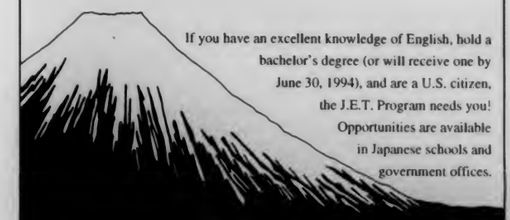
U.N. envoy Dante Caputo said the army had "exclusive responsibility" for the protest.

"We believed its commitment was real. But no," Caputo told reporters at the U.S. Embassy.

He said the port harrassment was only a temporary setback to plans to bring in a 1000 member U.N. force of police trainers, medics, and other support personnel by month's end. About 700 Americans are supposed to participate.

The army commander, Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras, made an unscheduled ceremony trip to lay a wreath at a statue of Haiti's independence leader, Jean Jacques Dessalines.

Cedras was accompanied by his chief aide, Brig. Gen Philippe Biamby.



Haiti's army has done nothing to stop the wave of violence preceding the Aristide's scheduled return on Oct. 30.

On Sunday, it expressed "surprise" American troops would be carrying M-16 rifles for a mission the United Nations describes as nonconfidential. The army said that contradicted the spirit of the accord on Aristide's reinstatement, which stipulated foreign soldiers be only lightly armed

Prime minister Robert Malval countered that the military was violating the agreement by failing to disarm military auxiliaries believed responsible for the violence.

Another U. S warship, the USS Fairfax County, is to arrive Oct. 20, carrying hundreds more soldiers.

overthrown."

Thomas Cech of the University of Colorado and Sidney Altman of Yale University said that Sharp and Roberts' discoveries provided a foundation for their own work showing that RNA could be a catalyst for chemical reactions in a cell. They won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1989.

"Next to the discovery of the structure of DNA, this [was] probably the greatest discovery in genetics in the last 70 to 80 years," Altman said. "This concept that genes could have huge interruptions in the final product was revolutionary," Cech said. "Nobody was aware of this."

Genes, the building blocks of hereditary material, had been thought to be unbroken segments along their strand of DNA. Roberts and Sharp discovered genes can be discontinuous—spread over several, separated segments.

They found that in humans and other higher organisms, cells contain both DNA that are used to build protein and so called "nonsense DNA, " or introns, that have no protein message. Messenger RNA slices the DNA. It removes the nonsense DNA and assembles the remaining DNA together in the correct order. When this process goes awry, the result could be cancer or other diseases.

Scientists believe that the physical rearrangement of DNA could speed the evolution of man and other higher animals.

Roberts said he "stumbled," upon the discovery. "We were looking for something completely different and things didn't quite work out the way we expected, so we followed through to find out," he said.

Sharp said he was "fortunate to be in the right place at the right time doing the right experiment," in discovering the RNA splicing. But, he added: "If we hadn't made the this discovery, within six months, there would have been 10 other labs making the discovery. The field was so primed to look at the structure of genes that it would have been made by many other laboratories."

At the time of the discoveries, Roberts was working at the Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory on Long Island, N.Y., and Sharp was at MIT. They were studying the genetic material of the adenovirus, a virus that causes the common cold.

Both Roberts and Sharp make presentations about their discoveries at a meeting in Cold Spring Harbor in 1977.

"It was a discovery that within months was obsolete," Sharp said. "Everybody, everywhere knows about it. You worked 10 years to discover it and within two weeks, you couldn't give a talk about it because everybody in the room knew what you were going to say." Sharp said he knew the discovery was "different," but he didn't realize the impact.

"Did I know that it was going to mushroom into the case where 99 percent of all our genes are expressed this way and become a whole field of science? No," he said. "But it was a little giggly as we were working through it, trying to figure out just what we were doing."

501 years of the battle against oppression

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Exiled Presitent of Haiti Jean-Bertrand Aristide

To the People of Haiti

I had decided not to write this year, to silently hold on to the frustration and despair that overwhelms me daily. To ignore the cries of my people dying of brutality and famine because some of my countrymen along with their accomplices abroad have decided to condemn Haiti to perpetual misery in order to line their pockets. Lately their cries have become too loud, their agony too terrifying to be ignored. Call me weak if you must, but I refuse to be part of this genocide. I must do what I can to bring their plight forth, to fight and die if I must.

My plea is to my countrymen studying here at the University. To those of them who lived well and those who didn't. Our country is being devastated because most of us have chosen to stay silent because we either fear reprisals or we have benefited from the exploitations, murders and tortures that go on in our country. Although we acknowledge being Haitians, we have forgotten the legacy of courage, pride, determination and bravery of our ancestors. I say that it is time to teach the world once more the true meaning of self-determination.

Moise
TIRADO

Our ancestors were instrumental in fighting for the independence of this country in which we are now studying. They objected to slavery both in words and deeds in this country throughout Latin America, giving their blood to free countries such as Columbia, Venezuela and many other countries in Latin America who are now much better off than our own. We can no longer afford to sit on the sideline, while the rest of the world is passing us by. Our generation is the only hope Haiti has, we cannot, no matter the cost, just live our lives in lush while our country is going down the tube. If we do, we will be saying to the world that our ancestors fought for the wrong reasons.

Our parents have let Haiti down. We must not. Haiti can become what it used to be: "THE PEARL OF THE CARIBBEAN," if we work collectively to make it happen. I am asking you today to think as Haitians first and students second, to make a commitment to our land. A commitment to rekindle the hope of our fellow countrymen; to remember that it is our duty to save our people from despair. While you are doing that, remember how many have died because our parents were too preoccupied with making money.

Haiti is dying because we have let outside forces dictate our destiny. Our Constitution was trampled on once, we must not let it happen again. I am asking fellow Haitians to take a stand in your own ways. We must not become so Eurocentric that we forget our history. The conditions in our country will not be improved if we don't lend a hand. We cannot rely on western powers to find solutions to problems that our fathers have created. Our country needs us. Our people are dying because of our willingness to do what it takes to bring dignity and honor back to them.

Those of you who remember our history should know that our forefathers did the impossible. They defeated the French, the British, the Spaniards, and the Americans to create what we can now call Haiti. Should we let their victorious struggle be in vain? Should we close our ears to the cries of agony, of our people? Each generation will be judged for their contributions. How we will be judged will be determined by how we lead our country. We must make the millionaires, billionaires and ourselves accountable for the present conditions in our country. We must work collectively to put an end to this violence against our people. If we fail to do so, we should forever be known as immorals. We are born. We live, and we die. What we do in our lifetime will determine our worth to society. No matter our contribution though, if it is not done to help our country then we work vainly.

Let us line ourselves in the footsteps of our heroes and say in a voice that all mankind will hear VIVE HAITI! NO MORE EXPLOITATIONS. NO MORE KILLINGS. NO MORE TORTURES! Let us remember what our great hero Toussaint Louverture said on his way to Prison. We are destined to be leaders. We have what it takes to move things around, all we need is a commitment to ourselves and to our country.

I urge you today to rethink your goals in life, and refocus them around this great country that is ours; so that one day, when it is time for us to leave this world, we can be remembered as people who had a purpose, a country, and who have done their best to help Haiti progress. We must not let our lives and that of our many countrymen in the torture chambers back home pass unnoticed.

Moise S. Tirado is a UMass student.

HUACAS

The battle for Survival

By Moise Tirado
Collegian Staff

Huacas lives in the town of Guayabo, in northern Costa Rica. He is a member of the Huetar clan that once ruled the region; however, the arrival of the western civilization changed his world forever.

Is this the kind of life you wanted to live?

I hoped certain things were different. You see...we have to be realistic about our situation, the White man took over our land and culture, and there is nothing we can do now to change that. I'm not saying we can't make things better but there will be no turning back to the period of the "Aguila Harpia," when we were the owners of our future. Our task now is to make sure our culture survives. I laugh because our culture is so much richer than this culture that surrounds us but we have a difficult time keeping it alive.

Should we celebrate Columbus Day?

Yes, we should celebrated it as a reminder to the world of the events that took place, of the systematic elimination of our people. It should also be a reminder for us, that we are losing this battle. Every year that goes by is another year we have lost. The "conquistadores" say that they brought civilization to us. We already had civilization, one that believed in nature. Today there's no harmony. Everything is destroyed. Do they know that one day they will have to rebuild? They don't have time to think, they're to busy making money. There will be a day when they look back and see how much destruction they have done. If our culture is still alive by then, the new "conquistadores" will have to look at it with envy, because we had the answers but they never asked...

What legacy are you leaving to your children?

I will not have much when I die, maybe my little wooden house and a plot of land. Those are things that I control. My legacy deals with a different way of life, how to deal with the things we cannot control. There is this belief that the people from the city have, that they actually have control of the world. I've heard that there in the United States people believe they rule the world.

If only they knew how wrong they are. Nature is the most powerful force on earth. You can't control the wind, the moon, the sun. I laugh when the volcano explodes and they get to experience how insignificant we are. I teach my children to learn how to deal with this forces, so they are able to live in harmony with nature. How does an ant walk? What is the sound of the mountain? When I'm dead they will know these things. They will have respect for them. They will understand that they have to build spirituality.

How do you picture this new world?

This is a world were material matter rules over spirituality. I do not envy a civilization that is unable to deal with itself, where there's no peace. They are ignorants. They live like savages.

Moise Tirado is a Collegian staff member.

"I was riding along on my cool mountain bike, when I suddenly decided that I didn't really want to ride a bike any more and that I would really like a guitar. I put an ad in the Collegian, and someone called the first day to buy my bike. And, when I was looking through the Collegian classifieds, I saw the guitar of my dreams. I sold my bike and went to buy the guitar. Thank you Collegian!"

HALLOWEEN SAFETY TIPS
1. Never Trick-or-Treat alone. Go with a friend or in a group, and bring along an adult.
2. Never wear masks that block your view. Decorate your costume with reflective tape.
3. Never talk to strangers. Tell your parents about any one who is bothering you!
4. Wait until you get home before eating your treats. Throw out unwrapped candy.

Police accuse 15-year-old of killing family

By ANNE STUART
Associated Press

ROCHESTER, Mass. (AP) — A teenager who had repeated brushes with police was accused Monday of fatally shooting his parents and younger sister.

Gerald McCra, 15, was accused of killing his family Saturday evening, then apparently driving their bodies a short distance behind the home of his grandparents. The family had been living in a basement apartment at the grandparents' house while their new home was being built next door, authorities and neighbors said.

Killed were Gerard A. McCra Jr., 35, his wife, Merle C. McCra, 37, and their daughter Melanie Dean McCra, 11, according to Rochester police.

McCra was due to appear Tuesday in a juvenile session of Wareham District Court to face charges of juvenile delinquency by reason of murder. Under state law, a hearing automatically will be held to consider trying the boy as an adult.

Plymouth County District Attorney William O'Malley said he could not discuss what might have prompted the killings. He noted that the son had been treated with a drug to combat hyperactivity, but it was not known whether he was taking the medication at the time of the murders.

O'Malley also said police were familiar with the boy and had gone to the house "on a couple of occasions because of disturbances in the family."

"He'd just become a punk," said a former friend, Mike Outer. "You couldn't talk to him without fighting."

John Beirjar, a former classmate of the son, said the suspect frequently argued with his family.

"His mouth always got him in trouble," Beirjar said.

But another longtime acquaintance of the family, Paul Gonneville, described them as "close knit."

"The only memories I've got of this family are positive ones — good, good memories," he said.

In a later interview, however, Gonneville said, "There are some negative things, but I don't want to say it."

"It was 1967," Eshbach said. "In the newspaper I saw this tiny five line ad that asked for help with the University's book rush. I was hired and my first day was Sept. 8."

Eshbach thought that, since she wasn't a permanent employee, she would be let go after the first three weeks.

"I really wanted to work but I'm a big Red Sox fan and I wanted to go to the 1967 World Series," she said. Eshbach asked for and got the day off and still kept her position. She worked part-time until 1970 when she decided to work full-time.

"Working with young people keeps you young," she said. "Plus, I know a vast number of customers personally by name." "She's outstanding," Miles Seaver, operation manager for the University Store said, "She's not going to retire, we won't let her retire!"

"My daughter always tells people," Eshbach said, "If you get homesick up at UMass — just go see my mother!"

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Treat others as you would like to be treated in the same circumstances. Too much daydreaming could allow the competition to pass you by. Give romance a second chance.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your interest in current events helps you uncover valuable inside information. A languishing love relationship could catch fire again. Buy some sports apparel and gear.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): An excellent day for making important new contacts. Follow your hunches when handling private affairs, but stick to logic in business. Diplomacy helps you ward off hostile remarks.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Intellectual ties become stronger now. You form an important friendship. Those seeking new work for next fall had better get busy! Honing your skills will increase your earning potential.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Pay more attention to a co-worker's suggestions; they could save you time and money. To improve your mind, enroll in a special course. It may be time to change your whole strategy in romance.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Certain restrictions are lifted now. You are finally able to take off in a new direction. Do not try to move too quickly. Romance must develop at its own sweet pace.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A financial disagreement could cause a rift. Work away from the public eye but keep in touch with someone who can provide valuable information. The pieces of a romantic puzzle fall into place.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Those who are nearing graduation should not worry too much about the future. Do your best and you will find the opportunities you seek. A financial situation improves.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Be careful not to put all of your eggs into one basket when making financial investments. A so-called "sure thing" is actually pretty risky.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Careful planning and attention to detail will make a public event a huge success. Think big. Ask for a large financial donation from a corporation.

X-C finishes 14th at Short

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country travelled down to Pennsylvania Saturday for the 20th edition of the Paul Short Invitational and came home with an impressive 14th place finish.

The Minutemen finished 14th in a field of 31 that included 12 of the top 34 teams in the nation. UMass had a team score of 414 which was good enough to place them ahead of 34th ranked Northern Arizona.

Head coach Ken O'Brien had expressed some concern about how his team would handle such an elite group of competition.

"I felt they handled it very well," O'Brien said. "They responded well to the high level circumstances."

O'Brien said he was pleased with the overall team performance. He considered the meet to be one of the best cross country meets in the country, outside of the NCAA's.

"We knocked off one of the top teams," he said.

The Minutemen were led by junior Ted Towse, who finished the race 46th overall. Towse completed the 10,000 meter course in 32:10. O'Brien was pleased with Towse's ability to run with the top group of runners.

Saturday's course was 1.2 miles longer than the courses UMass had previously raced on. Something that had coach O'Brien a little unsettled.

"I was anxious to see what would happen with the 10,000 meters," O'Brien said. "The extra 1.2 miles helped us. The kids responded physically and mentally to the race."

Sophomore Ethan Nedeau continued his strong season finishing second for UMass in 32:29.7. He placed 61st. Nedeau was followed by Matthew Behl who finished 93rd in 32:56.6 and Kevin Greenhalgh who placed 96th in 32:58.5. Jonathan Way, finishing 122nd in 33:20.9, rounded out the top five for the Minutemen..

An 8,000 meter race was also held Saturday with the Minutemen taking 13th place with 401 points. Freshman Paul Blodorn placed 38th in 26:22 to lead UMass.

The Minutemen return to action this Saturday when they travel to New Britain, Conn. to take part in the Eastern Conference meet.

Minutemen suffer first defeat

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

Despite winning the top two singles matches, the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team lost for the first time this season to the Vermont Catamounts, who swept three doubles matches and took four of six singles matches.

The loss left the Minutemen 2-1, who started the day poorly by practically handing the doubles point to the Catamounts with three uninspired losses.

The number one tandem of Kasper Vaala and Dave Bradley were outclassed by Dan Forman and Marcus Eyth, 8-2. The number two pairing of Keith Murray and Ankur Baishya were quickly disposed of by Evan Goldstein and Kent Seifers by the same margin, and Sasha Bluestone and Kevin Hicks fell quietly to Christian Thorhburg and Andrew Sirota in the third doubles contest, 8-5.

"The doubles [players] tried too hard," coach Judy Dixon said. "And when you try too hard in tennis, nothing works."

With the point awarded to the Catamounts for its doubles romp, the pressure was on the Minutemen, who needed to win four singles matches to seize the overall victory. One of those wins came at the top, where Vaala turned in the performance of the afternoon by knocking off Goldstein 7-5, 6-4.

But it wasn't easy. Vaala fell behind 5-1 and faced five set points on Goldstein's serve, yet he turned them all away and then proceeded to win nine straight games to take the first set and go ahead 3-0 in the second. Goldstein pulled back to 5-4 but got no closer. The next game and match were Vaala's.

"Kasper is a beautiful, talented tennis player, and I've yet to really see him play tennis," Dixon said. "He didn't play a good match, but he still won at number one."

Baishya avenged his lackluster doubles effort with a 7-6, 7-5 win over Eyth in second singles.

"This was Ankur's best match of the season," Dixon said. "He played well through the entire match."

Forman was a standout for Vermont. He augmented his easy doubles triumph with an equally sweatless victory at Murray's expense in third singles, 6-1, 6-2.

Umass had its chances in the singles ladder, Dixon said, but couldn't pull out a victory in the 4th, 5th, and 6th slots, where Bradley lost to Siefers, 6-3, 7-5. Bill Bochnak fell to Sirota, 6-1, 6-2, and Joe Twer was beaten by Ben Rubin, 6-4, 6-1, respectively.

Courtney Smith crossed a ball from the right flank to the left corner, where Amy Trunk collected it and served it back across the goal mouth. The ball sailed to Colleen Milliken, who headed it in.

Just 48 seconds later the Reds made it 3-0. After a corner kick, Sandy Shimogaki knocked down a clearing pass and sent it to toward the net. Nicole Roberts deflected it to Rachel LeDuc on the left side of the net. The sophomore forward shot it off Hawk sweeper Lisa Kesselman and into the net.

"When you score three that quickly it can put you so high that it can be dangerous," Kocher said. "They can step up and take chances. But instead they just hung their heads."

"We converted on our opportunities. Up front we played terrific," Rudy said. "We had two more goals called back on us. It could have been 5-0."

Hartford (9-3) entered the game boasting a powerful offense, consisting of three All-Americans and a freshman front runner who had six goals on the season. Rudy was forced to counter with three freshman (Erin Lynch, Rebecca Myers and Shimogaki) and a sophomore (Smith).

"These are the times when you find out what you have with your young players," Rudy said. "They did a fine job compacting space and picking up for each other. It was more than just those four, though. It was a team defensive effort."

Kocher said he was surprised at the team's domination and cooperation with them playing well in back. Because of the team's good midfield, Hartford never got the ball over the midfield line, Kocher said.

Briana Scurry made three saves and collected her seventh shutout of the season. She was also named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week. Myers was named A-10 Freshman of the Week for her performance Saturday.

bled the subsequent kickoff on his own 22, the defense was summoned back out.

Williams was called for pass interference on third and 22 which gave the Rams an automatic first down. He redeemed himself on the fumble recovery.

"I'll tell you what. The reason the play happened is that we never gave up," said linebacker Mario Perry. "We never gave up, even though they were inches away from the end zone. We get penalties but we would not allow them to get in the end zone."

The Williams recovery was just one of eight URI turnovers. On the next series, UMass picked up a Cy Butler fumble on the URI 28, and John Johnson ran the ball in two plays later for the 23-7 advantage.

Fullback Rene Ingoglia, who gained 75 yards on the day, added another touchdown before the half after Breon Parker intercepted the first of his three pick offs on the day. The Minutemen held a 29-7 halftime lead.

"I wouldn't say I was a decoy today but Rhode Island stacked the middle, which opened it up for Frank and Johnny," he said. "They got some green around the end, and it was good because we could run when we had to run."

The game was marked by sloppiness. Massachusetts' final touchdown came when Parker grabbed a Hixson pass and returned it 41 yards in the game's niftiest run. URI scored with a minute left to cut it to 36-14.

"I wish I could talk about our players and the good plays instead of all the mistakes we made," said UMass Coach Mike Hodges. "We just need to continue to play well, work hard and clean up our mistakes. We have the potential to be a very good football team."

"Give him a lot of credit. He's been on the bench a little bit the last couple of games. There's no one with a better attitude than him."

On Friday the team lacked the finishing punch, falling to George Washington 2-0. Dan Chagnon and Ted Priestly put out inspiring efforts in the losing cause.

Northeastern visits the Minutemen tomorrow at 3 p.m., as UMass looks to put together consecutive victories for the first time this year.

"They are much improved," said Koch. "It's going to be a tough game."

Minuteman defense steps up to beat Rams

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Offensively, the University of Massachusetts football team ran over the University of Rhode Island all day in last Saturday's 36-14 win, but it was a single play by the defense in the second quarter which pushed the Minutemen to victory.

Rhode Island 14
Massachusetts 36

With UMass up 10-7 with nine minutes left in the half, Rams quarterback Chris Hixson was stripped at the UMass 3-yard line when he was threatening to go in for the go-ahead score.

Cornerback Tony Williams picked up the ball and sprinted 70 yards to the URI 24 before being tripped up by running back Cy Butler. It was undeniably the play of the game.

"I thought it was a good opportunity to make a big play after I gave them a first down [on a pass interference penalty]," Williams said. "I think Scott Assencoa stripped him, and I scooped it up and tried to get to the end zone."

Three plays later, first-year Frank Alessio scored a touchdown on a 17-yard run, completing a two-touchdown turnaround, and giving UMass a 16-7 lead.

"We drove the ball well, but we gave the ball back to them," said Rhode Island Coach Floyd Keith. "That changes the whole complexion of the game. I mean there's no magic to it, guys."

Eric Oke began the scoring with a chip shot field goal and UMass built a 10-0 lead after Alessio ran a pitch 13 yards to the right end for his first touchdown in three weeks.

But URI came back with a 73-yard drive that bridged the first and second quarters and cut the lead to 10-7. They saw senseless offside penalties by the UMass defense and its inability to stop Rhode Island on a number of third and short plays.

The drive took a lot out of the defense, as they were on the field for six minutes, but when Matt Rajotte fum-

UMASS beats the University of Rhode Island Rams in an impressive 36-14 victory last Saturday. The Minutemen meet Connecticut next on Saturday, October 16.

Minuteman D shows depth

ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

For every Mario Perry, you have a Scott Assencoa.

For every Ben Albert, you have a Silas Burke.

For every Brian Corcoran, you have a Vernard Fennell.

And, for every Matt Rajotte, you have a Breon Parker.

The University of Massachusetts football team proves its depth each week on the defensive side. Saturday's 36-14 defeat of the University of Rhode Island was no different.

The defense was on the field almost 15 minutes more than the offense, as the Rams possessed the ball for 37:41 to the Minutemen's 22:19. URI's time of possession included having the ball for 20:40 of the 30 minute half.

Yet, despite having the ball for most of the game, the Rams put the ball in the end zone on only two occasions, one being late in the fourth quarter against the second team defense.

Two games ago it was Rajotte, the senior free safety, intercepting James Madison University quarterback Mike Cawley three times. This past weekend Parker, a cornerback, matched Rajotte's effort with three of his own against the Rams.

Parker, a sophomore transfer, picked off two Chris Hixon passes and one of backup quarterback Tony Squitieri.

This included a spectacular fourth quarter play when, on third and 13th on their own 41 yard, Hixon threw a pass into the hands of Parker, who intercepted it and ran 41 yards for the score.

"I love the ball, but defense is where my heart is at," said Parker after a reporter asked about the possibility of playing offense.

"Breon's run was amazing, absolutely amazing," said Mike Hodges, the UMass coach. "That is definitely going on the highlight film."

For his outstanding game, Parker was awarded the Coca-Cola Gold Helmet as the New England University Division One Player of the Week, the second consecutive week a Minutemen has received the award (Rene Ingoglia was the other).

Parker was not the only one to excel in the defensive backfield. Rajotte also had an interception, and junior cornerback Tony Williams recovered a fumble and returned it 70 yards in the second quarter to Rhode Island's 24 yard line. William's exciting play, which Hodges termed as a "gigantic play in the game," led the Minutemen to their second touchdown of the day.

The pass rush had a huge day, with Fennell leading the way with two and a-half sacks and Corcoran chipping in with two. Other standouts on the Minutemen "D" were Perry, Assencoa, Albert, Burke, David Dakin, and Mike Valentino.

Field hockey continues success

Rothenberger and Hart shine as Minutewomen roll

MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team extended their winning streak to 10 games this weekend, defeating Lafayette (1-0) and St. Joseph's (4-0) in Philadelphia.

Lafayette gave the Minutewomen their toughest challenge in recent memory. The Leopards used four attackers instead of the usual three, a move that confused the UMass defense.

UMASS 1, Lafayette 0
UMASS 4, St. Joseph's 0

"It was one of the strangest games I've ever been a part of," said UMass head coach Pam Hixon. "The field was incredibly bumpy. They play a totally different style, and we struggled with it."

Freshmen Kyle Rothenberger played the hero for the third straight game. Less than 10 minutes into the game, she collected a pass from Jenn Salisbury and shot it passed Lafayette goalie Jackie D'Angelo for the game's only score.

"We scored early and that was important," Hixon said.

Hilary Rose, turning back six Lafayette shots in goal, was impressive for the Minutewomen.

The UMass offense came to life Sunday on the turf at St. Joe's where they scored early and often to defeat the Hawks 4-0.

Redshirt freshmen goalie Stacy Walker played well in her debut replacing Rose, who suffered an elbow injury in practice on Saturday.

Hixon said that she doesn't believe the injury is serious, but she is unsure if Rose will play Wednesday against Dartmouth.

Natalie Hart continued her offensive brilliance, scoring three goals in the first half. She converted a penalty corner just over two minutes into the game, and UMass never looked back.

"This team comes to play," Hixon said. "We overcame the adversity of not having our starting goalie."

Four minutes into the second half Danielle Borges notched her second goal of the season to close out the scoring.

Soccer earns satisfying win

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

As the final seconds ticked off the clock at Richard F. Garber Field, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team exploded off their bench onto the field.

Smiles, hugs and sighs of relief filled the air, as the club notched a hard fought 2-1 triumph over West Virginia on Sunday.

UMASS 2, W. Virginia 1
UMASS 0, G.Washington 2

It was the team's first win since a 6-0 shutout of Rhode Island seven games ago. UMass improves to 3-9 overall and ups its Atlantic 10 mark to 2-4.

"It feels great," said Sam Koch, the head coach. "They deserved it, and they haven't given up [all year]. When you're 2-9, to go into a game it's awfully hard."

The Minutemen did not make it look too hard, as they controlled nearly every aspect of the game. Justin Edelman's strike with 13:06 left in the second half sealed the victory.

Mike Doyle (two assists) lofted a beautiful ball off an indirect kick to Edelman from about 30-yards out. Edelman charged through a pack of players at the far post, heading the ball into the empty net.

"[Edelman] finally broke the jinx," Koch said. "He hasn't been able to put one in, and he finally got one. It was a great win."

After falling behind 1-0 only 6:29 into the game, UMass clawed and scratched, but was unable to even the score until midway through the second half.

It was Randy Jacobs who knotted the score at one, as he converted a superb Doyle feed. Doyle threaded the needle to the senior sniper, as Jacobs low shot beat West Virginia keeper Mark Thienel.

"Randy mentioned at halftime that they were really flat," said Koch. "He told them to look for him because he could get through them. And, that's what he did."

While Jacobs finishing act was impressive, perhaps even more spectacular was the pass from Doyle.

"That was a great ball that sent him through," said Koch. "Mike is playing well within his range. When he plays within his abilities, he's a very hard player to play against.

U.S. warship pulls out of Haitian port

By ED McCULLOUGH
Associated Press

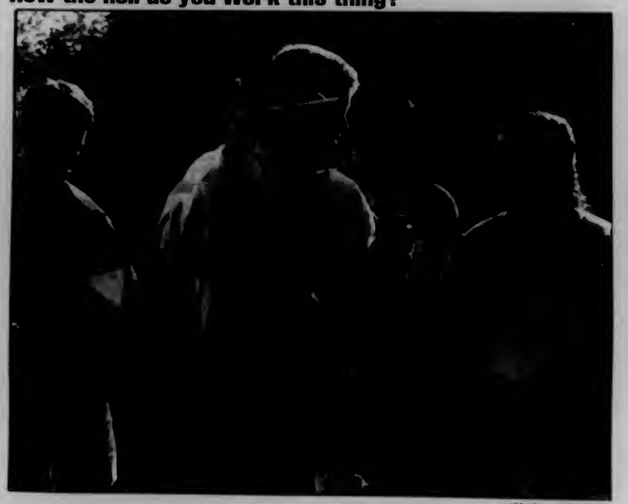
PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti—Hundreds of militant right-wingers cheered Tuesday as an American warship left Haiti, in a retreat that marked a major setback for the U.N. mission to restore democracy here.

The aborted troop deployment threatened to derail international efforts to prepare for the return of exiled President Jean Dertrand Aristide on Oct. 30, U.S. officials in Haiti said.

The National Coalition declared Tuesday a "day of indignation," stopping buses to keep children out of school and urging their army to resist a foreign "invasion."

"We're ready to die!" said Jacques Robert, 32, an engineer who with scores of others stayed through an all-night "patriotic vigil" at the dock.

"We'll stay here till Oct. 30. We're mobilized. We don't want Aristide back!"



The USS Harlan County pulled anchor just minutes after the Pentagon ordered it to withdraw to international waters.

Among the crowd of applauding, cheering people at dockside was a beaming, gun-wielding senior aide to Haitian army commander Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras, who ousted Aristide in 1991.

In the match between Haiti and the international community, "Haiti has just scored the first goal," said the aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Blockade bill stalled again

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON—A Senate vote on a bill outlawing blockades of clinics that perform abortions was delayed again Tuesday, angering pro-choice forces concerned the measure could die this legislative year.

"The opponents just want to delay and defer and retard action," said Sen. Lois Pines, D-Newton. "One ammendment will kill the bill."

Pines, fighting the anti-abortion leadership of the Senate, has pushed for quick action ever since the chamber gave preliminary approval to the bill in June on a 25-11 vote. The House passed it the month before.

The bill would provide a maximum penalty of six months in jail and $1,000 fine for the first offense and up to 2 1/2 years in jail and $5,000 fine for subsequent offenses.

A Superior Court order prohibits about 40 activists and certain organizations from continuing to block access to clinics, but supporters of the bill say that does not go far enough.

They also say current laws on trespassing and disturbing the peace are not strong enough against groups such as Operation Rescue, which stage blockades.

Sen. Robert Antonioni, D-Leominster, who opposes abortion, offered an amendment extending the bill's trespassing and disturbing the peace regulations to all such demonstrations, rather than only those at clinics where abortions are performed.

"All of those who disrupt the public's right to access should be punished in a similar way," Antonioni said, using as an example a huge march during the Persian Gulf War that blocked Boston's Storrow Drive for hours.

But pro-choice advocates said the two instances were different because women go to clinics for medical attention.

Blockades are "different than other sorts of demonstrations," said Ellen Convisser, head of the state's National Organization for Women chapter. "Demonstrating is something we do support, but this is not demonstrating ... it's very different from holding signs abd stopping traffic."

Since Antonioni requested his amendment be printed on the calendar, the bill won't come up for debate until the next formal session, which Senate president William Bulger, D-Boston, scheduled for Monday.

Supporters say the bill, sponsored by Rep. David Cohen, D-Newton, has gone farther than any other pro-choice bill in a body run by Bulger, a staunch abortion foe.

The bill's backers said any change to the measure would doom it this year, because it would be subject to another vote in the House and another round of committee deliberations.

CIA wins court battle

Man loses appeal over his termination

by LAURIE ASSEO
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—A CIA employee fired for hiding his homosexuality from the agency for more than five years lost an appeal to the Supreme Court Tuesday.

The court refused to hear his job bias argument that the CIA improperly views homosexual employees as a greater security risk than heterosexuals.

A lower court ruling in the case leaves federal executive agencies free to discriminate against gay employees, the appeal had argued.

The man identified in court papers as John Doe has been on paid administrative leave since 1985, when a federal judge ruled that his dismissal had been improper.

CIA spokesman David French said the agency now will consider seeking reimbursement of Doe's pay and benefits.

In other actions Tuesday, the court:

—Let stand the conviction of New Hampshire school instructor Pamela Smart, serving a life prison term for coaxing her student lover to kill her husband in 1990.

—Agreed to use a Maryland case to consider giving convicted criminals an earlier chance to challenge career-offender sentences based partly upon their prior convictions.

—Agreed to clarify the deadline for giving people charged with federal

European Community ready to implement union designs

By SALLY JACOBSEN
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP)—The European Community has the green light to go ahead with its grand design for a political and monetary union, with a common foreign policy and a single currency by the end of the decade.

But the new federation is unlikely to rival the United States for international influence anytime soon.

Instead, economic recession, currency upheavals and public opposition likely will produce a weak federal government with limited powers over the 12 nations of the trading bloc.

A German court removed the final hurdle to ratification of the treaty on European union on Tuesday. The court struck down challenges that the treaty violated the German constitution by transferring national powers to the European Community.

The much awaited decision wi'i allow the accord to go into effect, most likely on Nov. 1. A special summit of EC leaders will be held Oct. 29 to begin implementing the pact.

"There's a deep sigh of relief in the drinking of the champagne, but it

Correction

Due to a production error, two items from yesterday's Third World Affairs page did not appear. The community calendar is reprinted above, and a column will be printed on the editorial/opinion page. In addition, the author of an interview was misidentified. The author was Juan Jose Chacon Quiros.

In a page one story on the Mullins Center, the Collegian incorrectly reported that Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance, issued and agreed with a report stating the arena doesn't meet safety code requirements. The report was issued by Zallen Engineering, and Page did not comment on the accuracy of the report.

Also, an incorrect time was printed in the GLB Forum. The radio show "This Way Out" can be heard at 1:05 p.m. on WTTT 1430 AM.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

UMass mascot topic of rally

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

A petition demanding the school mascot, the "Minuteman" be changed because it is a symbol of oppression was the focal point of a rally held yesterday in the Cape Cod lounge.

Chancellor David K. Scott said he is looking into the issue and will wait to receive more history and research on the topic. He said he thinks it is important to look into the idea.

Despite the fact that millions of dollars have been sunk into the marketing of the Minuteman, Scott plans to hear discussion on the matter.

"No one ever said justice is cheap," Scott said.

The American Freedom Federation held the third in a series of rallies aiming to present a "greater awareness of the issues." Martin Jones, the group's president, said he is organizing the rallies to broaden perceptions of social injustices.

Jones said the school mascot is racist and sexist and portrays "a white man with a gun." He said it is a symbol of oppression and a representation of the slaughtering of the Native American tribe in Amherst by local militia.

The issue was first raised at the last of the minority forums, according to Jones. He addressed the issue to Scott.

By First Wind, White Wing, a Pocumtuck Native American from the local tribe spoke at the rally. He spoke about the injustice of celebrating Columbus Day.

"Columbus Day is not a day to celebrate, it's a day of mourning," Wing said.

He said the name should be anything but Columbus Day, because the name Columbus "perpetuates 501 years of genocide."

Wing, an Amherst resident is also part Swedish. He said he was planning to protest the holiday locally and was especially moved by S. Brian Wilson, the Vietnam veteran who is conducting a hunger strike on the Amherst town common to protest Columbus Day.

Sharon "Aisis" Cousins, a graduate student, recited a poem she had written, entitled "The vision — A new America." In her poem, she said "love is the only power and money doesn't matter."

Charles Lechner, the chief of the Radical Student Union read his proposal that the Tower Library should be renamed the W.E.B. DuBois library. He also said he would like to hold the administration to the promise of increased ALANA enrollment as well as the increase of financial aid to poor and disadvantaged students.

Jones opened the microphone to speakers from the floor. Lynn Silver, an Amherst resident said she believes our Native American brothers can teach us a great deal if we honor them.

Ray Elliott, the vice-president of the Amherst branch of the NAACP said, "speak out whenever you confront injustice anywhere."

Wing again took the microphone to make the audience aware of a situation in Canada in which Intuit Native Americans are losing their reservation. He said any form of protest on their part would be met with by gunfire from the government.

Wing said this is an emergency and the tribe needed help from their American counterparts.

Jones closed the rally by discussing the school mascot. He said that as an African-American, he was part of "the ongoing legacy of Columbus."

He said the changing of the school mascot would be included with the petition to change the name of the library and would circulate within the next few days.

Student Government Association President David Nuñez said he has yet to form an opinion on the matter and would like to first find out the feelings of the campus.

Program gets UMass help

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Correspondent

It has been 18 years since The Companionship Program first began, and University of Massachusetts students have added to its success.

The Companionship Program first started in 1975. It is a program of the Resource Center, which is a Hampshire Community United Way agency. The program is a smaller version of the Big Brother/Big Sister Organization.

Joan Snowdon, case coordinator of the program, explained that the program branched off from the community center. "There were kids who really needed more attention than the people at the Youth Center could give them," said Snowdon.

The program matches an adult volunteer with a child in the Amherst area. "We serve children from ages five to 17, from all kinds of families. We serve children who have experienced homelessness, from Jessie's House, Cambodian refugees, and children with special needs," said Snowdon. The process of becoming a companion involves filling out an extensive application, and setting up an interview. The committee then tries to find a match.

"Making a match is very important. We like to get to know the person in order to make a good match. This process is was takes the longest," said Snowdon.

The program requires three to five hours a week to be spent with the child. There is also monthly supervision and training of the volunteers by the program staff.

The program expects volunteers to be a companion for a year. Students fulfill two semesters with the exception of Wintersession and summer vacation. "Yet the students keep in touch with the children by writing letters to one another, or calling each other," said Snowdon.

Carrie Stack, a senior from UMass, and a companion in the program, stressed that the program is a big commitment. "You have to be able to put the child first. Although, it is the most amazing experience," said Stack.

Two-thirds of the program's volunteers are college students. One-third are community members. The largest majority of companions come from UMass.

"UMass is well organized in advertising in getting students involved with the community. Vibes is one program on campus which works to get students involved in community service," said Snowdon.

The Mather Career Center also gets students involved by offering internships. The psychology department and the School of Education also provide ways for students to get involved in the Comapanionship Program. They offer opportunities of hands-on experience with needy children.

Funding for the Companionship Program is provided by area businesses. "We have connections who give us coupons, tickets, tickets from the Fine Arts Center; for which we are very grateful," said Snowdon.

Support for the program also comes from fundraisers, recruitment, sports teams, churches, and the United Way.

"The Companionship Program is more than babysitting; which is what people think and shouldn't. The kids get so much appreciation out of the program. Just doing the little thing, they get so much excitement from it," said Kim Hallisey, a senior at UMass.
kind of relationship can do." said Snowdon.

Krushchev on Russian reform

Former premier's son pessimistic about future

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Sergei Khrushchev, son of former Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, expressed his pessimism of economic reforms in Russia and stated that the changes that need to be initiated will encounter many obstacles. The question and title of the speech was "Challenges for the New Republics of Eastern Europe: Can They Survive?"

"I'm not optimistic about the democratic future in Russia," he said. "They say the pessimist is the well-informed optimist."

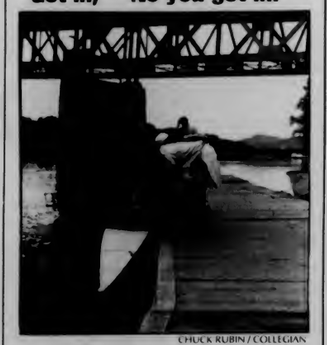
He said the economic reforms weren't the result of winning the Cold War. It showed the country it needed to reform their society as a whole, but as far as the traditional communistic system is concerned, "it's impossible to measure everything from one point."

He said the decision to step toward democracy, however abbreviated, occurred after the death of Stalin in the 1950s. The format, however, wasn't democracy then and it isn't democracy now, he added.

"A socialistic system can't survive in the same society with a democratic one," he said. "If you change one, you must change the other."

The republics, which all depend on one another for political clout, were changed from a centralized economy to a market economy, but without private property, a point Khrushchev cites was a big mistake.

He also tagged the issue of monopolization of products, saying that although the government decided not to be involved with enterprises' production of goods, "in the next two years, inflation will rise for the 1,000th time."



These enterprises couldn't pay their debts, and resorted to making arrangements with each other for compensation. That caused a situation much like animals in a forest, an analogy he chose to use to illuminate the dire monetary strife that companies exist in there.

"Only the strong survive, and where you're weak, you'll die," he said. "If you don't know how to define bankruptcy, you'll fail in reforming economically."

He said bankruptcy is a term fairly uncommon to the Russian economists. it was recently introduced, but Parliament rejected it, reasoning that 70 to 80 percent of the businesses would collapse if it was enacted and enforced.

"I wouldn't invest in the former Soviet Union," he said, noting that economic laws change often and that production has dropped 65 percent as of late.

"Get in," "No you get in."

Two Detroit policemen to face long sentences

By JULIA PRODIG
Associated Press

DETROIT—Two former policemen convicted of beating a motorist to death outside an inner city crack house escaped life sentences Tuesday, one getting 12 to 25 years behind bars, the other eight to 18 years.

The judge said Larry Nevers and Walter Budzyn must be held accountable for, even if they didn't intend to kill Malice Green, 35, an unemployed steelworker who suffered at least 14 blows to the head and had part of his scalp torn off.

The dismissed officers appealed to judge George W. Crockett II for leniency.

They said they didn't mean for Green to die and said he just got out of hand. Crockett responded that it was the officers who got out of hand.

The judge gave Nevers the stiffer sentence, although both men were convicted of second degree murder. A request to extend bail was denied and they were taken to jail.

"It is time for the world to see through the excuses and face the truth. Mr. Budzyn and Mr. Nevers killed my husband," said his widow, Rose Mary Green.

Witnesses during the officers' summer-long trial testified they saw the two white officers repeatedly beat Green with their heavy metal flashlights outside a suspected drug house Nov. 5 when he refused orders to open his clenched hand. Green died on the way to a hospital.

"I did not kill Malice Green," Nevers told the judge. "I never intended to hurt him, to do anything to him other than to arrest him for a felony."

"I just reacted to the resistance to the arrest," said Nevers, 53, who had been honored several times during his 24 years on the police force.

"I'm sorry for what has happened. I was just doing my job. I never struck Mr. Green," said Budzyn, 47, who served 19 years on the force and had been named precinct officer of the year in 1990.

The officers were convicted Aug. 23 by two separate, predominantly black juries. The officers' supervisor at the scene is black and faces a trial on a misdemeanor charge of neglect of duty.

No testimony indicated race was a factor in the beating.

Budzyn and Nevers had faced a maximum of life in prison. Under Corckett's sentence, Nevers could be eligible for parole after nine years, eight months and 14 days. Budzyn could be eligible for parole after six years, five months and 22 days.

"Nobody likes to see polce officers prosecuted and sent to prison, but in this case the officers crossed the line," said Wayne County Prosecutor John O'Hair.

Defense lawyer John Goldpaugh said he would ask the Michigan Court of Appeal to free Nevers while he appeals for a new trial. Goldpaugh believes that sequestered jurors were tainted when they watched the movie "Malcolm X" during a break in deliberations.

He also believed the trial should have been moved out of Detroit.

When the sentences were announced, about 35 people cheered at the site where Green died. One sign that had read "No justice no peace" was edit to read "Justice and peace."

"It appears justice has been served," said the Rev. Wendell Anthony of the Detroit NAACP.

Retired Detroit Police officer Harry Romolino believes his friends should have been freed.

"They're out there doing a violent job and they're dealing with violent people," Romolino said outside the courthouse.

crimes their initial day in court. The case involves a California man accused of possessing counterfeit money.

In the CIA case, Doe joined the agency as a clerk typist in 1973 and was promoted to an undercover position in 1980. He began engaging in homosexual activity in 1970 and voluntarily told a CIA official in January 1982 that he was a homosexual, his appeal said.

Doe was placed on administrative leave the following month, and was fired that May.

He sued the agency, saying his firing denied him equal protection and due process. Doe said he could not be blackmailed about his homosexuality because his family and his homosexuality because his family and friends knew he was gay.

The CIA said it fired Doe because he intentionally hid his homosexual activity for more than five years although he knew it was a security concern. His refusal to name his sex partners might make him susceptible to threats to expose their identities, the CIA contended.

A federal judge decided that Doe was fired improperly. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reversed, saying there is no evidence the CIA has a blanket policy against employing homosexuals.

In the appeal rejected Tuesday, Doe's lawyers said the CIA considers homosexuals greater security risks than heterosexuals, even if the agency does not ban all gay employees.

will not herald a new era," said Stanley Crossick, veteran EC consultant in Brussels.

The European Union will not be as close a federation as some had envisioned when the treaty was crafted by EC leaders in the Dutch town of Maastricht in December 1991.

Their aspirations were scaled back after the treaty ran into opposition from voters fearful of a strong central government trying to regulate their daily lives.

Crossick said, "We don't have in (our) short term sight the United States of Europe."

The treaty calls for common foreign, security and eventually defense policies, and a joint central bank and single currency by 1999. It gives the community more powers in education, industry and the environment.

The 518 seat European Parliament will be strengthened to give it more say in trade, environment, education, health and consumer protection issues.

There may be delays in putting key provisions into practice.

Many nations are gripped by the worst recession in decades. Unemployment rates are soaring.

And their currencies have been badly battered in foreign exchange markets. The nations on Aug. 2 effectively suspended their 14-year-old European Monetary System.

The economic woes have cast doubt on whether the nations will be able to meet the 1999 deadline for opening a European-wide central bank. Britain and Denmark already have opted-out of the common currency.

Stomach bubbles and you

Gas bubbles in your intestines, boys and girls. You know about them. You've silently endured them in public situations that you didn't think you'd live through. They feel like spiked nuclear soccer balls rolling torturously through your bloated, sore innards. Let's discuss these evil bubbles from hell, shall we?

Being that I'm an enormously talented journalist, you may be tempted to think that I don't get gas bubbles. But I do. I understand the pain. I've been there. I know what it's like to absolutely have to refuse to dance at parties because you feel like any sudden movements could trigger a real nasty-smelling explosion of eye-watering gastric splatterings. I know that fear, folks. I've lived it just like you.

Wait. Let's think about the phrase "gastric splatterings" for just a moment. Oh my, isn't that pleasantly sexy?

Wouldn't that make a great Celestial Seasonings tea? Steep some of that in hot water for a few minutes and then treat yourself to a taste bonanza, kids. "Softly Herbal Gastric Splatterings." Yum.

We're talking about the kind of bubbles that pinch your entire body into a misshapen crab-like mess. They strike you at any time, but usually when you're either in public, at the opera, or driving. You're walking down an aisle at Stop & Shop, perusing the extensive Ramen Noodles selections, and suddenly you're thrashing around on the floor, spastically kicking your legs and knocking other shoppers and their carriages right through the canned foods section and into the next aisle.

You're at the opera. Suddenly gas bubbles brutally strike your intestines, thrashing your torso around, and you're flopping all over the place, bashing into other indignant opera-goers and knocking the balcony seats down, killing dozens.

You're driving along a quiet public road, whistling to some Debbie Gibson music and otherwise being an upstanding, solid citizen with impeccable driving skills. Then they hit! The Hell Bubbles! The Nuclear Intestinal Soccer Balls! They crunch you up into a writhing mass of twisted, tortured flesh. You smash so hard into the dashboard that you become a permanent fixture. Then you flip over nine times in a symphony of rending metal, exploding glass, and roaring flames, causing a 20-car pile-up and countless deaths.

Come to think of it, I wonder if actors ever have bad gas bubbles while they're accepting Academy Awards. Wouldn't that be wild, if Clint Eastwood were to limp up to the podium and announce, "Ladies and gentlemen, I've got some nasty gas right now. I shouldn't have had that big greasy snail & jalapeno pizza for lunch, so please excuse me if I let a few loud ones rip while I'm talking here tonight."

All in all, I think we're a better nation now that we've brought the topic of intestinal bloating problems out into the open. We all have those moments of distended stomach hell; there's nothing to be embarrassed about. Really.

Except if your stomach hell bursts out while you're in the middle of your first date with someone who's really beautiful. Then it's embarrassing. But if you're smart, you'll tell your date that it was just the hideous Appalachian Barking Spiders that have invaded your house, not you.

Frat gives thanks for generosity

The Brothers of Phi Sigma Kappa would like to thank everyone who has supported our brother and friend, Patrick McGowan, when he so strongly needs it.

Pat, a 1993 graduate of the University, was paralyzed last May after falling 60 feet while rock climbing in Colorado. Since that time Pat has been hospitalized at the Craig Hospital in Englewood, Colo., receiving care that is both intensive and very expensive. Although his spirits are high, Pat's family is faced with the reality that roughly 20 percent of his bills will not be covered by insurance.

In an effort to offset these costs, a foundation was set up in Pat's home town of Medway, Mass., and an auction held this past weekend. Two auctioneers volunteered their time to sell over 300 donated items, ranging from Hank Aaron and Willie Mays baseballs to airline tickets and time-shares.

In addition to the donated items, Phi Sigma Kappa was able to present a check for $1,000 to Pat's family. One thousand dollars raised here at the University through direct donations to our house and from a donation jar set up in the Newman Center, bringing Saturday's total to roughly $24,000.

Since then, two other fraternities at UMass, Theta Chi and Sigma Phi Epsilon, have both made plans to hold fund-raisers in Pat's honor. It is this type of generosity on behalf of Pat's friends that has helped him to get this far and will continue to help him throughout the course of his recovery. We will continue to accept any donations made at the Newman Center and sincerely thank those who have already given.

The cartoon catastrophe

It's Saturday morning, 8:00 a.m., and I am comfortably sleeping off Friday night's festivities when I receive a phone call from my father. He didn't really want anything, and I knew it. You see, my parents enjoy calling at obscene hours of the weekend mornings to simply remind me that they knew I was battling a hangover, and they felt I should get an early start on it.

So I thanked my Dad for his considerations and, since I was now fully awake, I decided to immerse myself in traditional Saturday morning fare: cartoons.

Mike
DAY

Now, admittedly, I hadn't watched Saturday morning cartoons in quite some time, so I was excitedly awaiting a reunion with my early childhood pals. I flipped the station to Channel five and looked for a nice warm up with the Hanna-Barbera All Stars. But instead of watching the Shmoo's in "The Land Before Time," or "Thendar the Barbarian," I witnessed Pinky the Pony help Bluey out of his bad mood in "My Little Pony." The horror!

Flustered, I flipped to NBC to catch the beginning of the Justice League. "This will be good," I thought, "I haven't seen the Wonder Twins and Gleek in a while."

The commercial ended, but, good God! Where was Aquaman (by far the coolest member of the Super Friends) and Green Lantern? They had been replaced by Captain Planet and the Earth Watchers. Captain Planet? Hoping he was a variation of the Super Friends, and willing to keep a somewhat open mind, I decided to give him a chance.

Well, friends, he is no Wonder Woman. He flits around town battling polluters. Yes, he battles polluters. Big, tough, litterbugs. And what hurts Captain Planet? Kryptonite? Death Rays? Oh no — trash wounds this "superhero." Please!

Now I was desperate. Frantically I flipped past Ninja Turtles (no comment), something called "Widget", and a cartoon about trolls. Where was Spiderman and Friends, or Richie Rich, Scooby Doo (without Scrappy), or even the Smurfs? I had almost given up hope when I spied a familiar character: Bugs.

Settling back in bed in hopes of enjoying some classic Looney Tunes, I was almost reduced to tears when I realized that I mistook Bugs Bunny for his nephew Bugsy. Augh!! What is wrong with television today? Are kids watching cartoons deemed too young to handle the antics of Wile E. Coyote and Droopy Dog? They have to watch their nieces and nephews?

I turned the tube off to ponder why the classic cartoons of my day had been yanked, in favor of this. . . this cute junk. I'll tell you this much, my kids aren't going to be watching these types of cartoons when they're ready to accept the Saturday morning mantle from me. No way. They'll be fed a constant diet of Underdog and Captain Caveman or they'll watch nothing at all.

After these thoughts, I turned the TV back on and kicked back with a little candlepin bowling to ease the pain. Then I caught the end of "Speed Racer" on MTV, and all was well.

GSS has a crisis in leadership

It was imminently ironic to read Graduate Student Senate President Shymala Ivatury's latest rantings about the lack of accountability and representation at the Everywoman's Center [Collegian, Oct. 7].

For the record, a couple of days before Ms. Ivatury launched her quixotic attack of EWC and its director, the GSS, in assembly, had determined that its executive committee could not present sufficient evidence to justify calling for a review of EWC operations. In fact, at the same meeting, the executive and Ms. Ivatury were expressly directed by the Senate to establish a dialogue with EWC to discuss the matters of concern to the new executive.

From Ms. Ivatury's persistence in making unsubstantiated and destructive remarks about EWC director Carole Wallace, one can only draw the conclusion that she, and by implication her colleagues, doesn't give a damn about what the Senate and other graduate students think.

If this was only an isolated case, one might give the president the benefit of the doubt. But the new executive committee has been engaging with disturbing consistency in malicious and puerile attacks on other organizations on campus; groups like the SGA, the EWC and the Civility Commission, that have been traditional allies of the graduate student community.

It is paradoxical enough, at a time when the SGA has the best leadership it's had in a decade, when the administration finally appears ready to take a pro-active stance with regard to issues of race and gender, that the current executive is out in left field, grandstanding and making enemies of every potential ally on campus.

Meanwhile, in the privacy of its own office, the current GSS executive is not doing any better. They seemingly treat the treasury as a slush fund, taking month-long vacations while on GSS payroll; disregard the GSS bylaws; plan costly and questionable administrative moves at the expense of every fee-paying graduate student, and what's more, attempt to exclude Senate input in these matters.

One can only hope that Quixote and friends will get off the saddle before they're out of a job. They have been elected to represent graduate students, not to use the GSS offices and resources to pursue their own narrow, personal agendas.

An obvious excuse for racism

When we read Becky Maloney's article, "By using racism as an excuse we will never overcome it," [Collegian, Oct. 4] we felt very insulted. Her article was full of inconsistencies and her criticisms were out of context.

In the first place, no one accused her of being racist. An American, who spoke Spanish, told Ms. Maloney that she had "felt racism." This was her personal opinion and not one shared by us, the Puerto Ricans involved in the incident; at least at that moment. Second, none of the residents in the room wrecked or damaged any property in the hall. Third, all the people in the room were signed in and we did not open an emergency door. The simple fact is she was not even there at the time when the alleged incidents occurred.

Many people were offended with her attempts to stereo-type Puerto Ricans (and any other minority for that matter) and for claiming that there was reverse discrimination. We would encourage her to take time and gather all relevant information before accusing anyone and to educate herself in real issues of diversity.

Denny case stalled yet again

Juror dismissed due to 'significant personal problems'

By MICHAEL FLEEMAN
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Deliberations in the Reginald Denny beating trial plunged into disarray again Tuesday as the judge dismissed another juror, threw out two verdicts and ordered the panel to start deliberations over again.

Superior Court Judge John Ouderkirk removed a middle-aged white male juror from the racially charged case because of personal problems unrelated to the trial.

The juror was replaced by a middle-aged black man who was selected by lottery, giving the reconstituted jury four blacks, two whites, two Asian Americans and four Hispanics. There are 10 women and two men. It was the fifth time a juror was removed and it left just one alternate.

The judge didn't detail the juror's problems, but said he learned of them in secret meetings between him and the juror.

"These appear to be significant personal problems," Ouderkirk said.

The excused juror was ordered to not talk about the case or say anything that could identify himself or other jurors until final verdicts are in.

Before the juror was removed, the sequestered panel had reached verdicts on two counts against Henry Watson, 29, who is on trial with Damian Williams, 20.

They were accused of pulling Denny from his truck and attacking him and others on April 29, 1992, during rioting that followed acquittal of four policemen in the videotaped beating of motorist Rodney King.

The defendants face life prison terms if convicted of the most serious charge: attempted premeditated murder on Denny.

After deliberating about half a day, the jury had decided whether Watson should be convicted of assault with a deadly weapon in an attack on a second motorist and of robbery on a third, the judge said.

At the request of Watson's attorney, Carl Broady, the judge threw out those verdicts and told the newly formed panel to deliberate from scratch.

On Monday, the judge dismissed a black woman accused by the 11 other jurors of lacking common sense, selected a replacement by lottery and told the panel to start again. That came after eight days of deliberations.

"The fact that they had to start deliberating again is a little frustrating," said District Attorney Gil Garcetti.

The defense didn't object to removing the white juror, identified only as No. 152.

Attorney Edi Faal, who represents Williams, said he was going to seek the removal of yet another juror, a white woman, for unrelated reasons.

Although U.S. officials say that only a minority of Haitians oppose Aristide's return, military-supported violence has hindered the transition government installed under the U.N. plan to restore democracy.

The Harlan County, carrying 472 servicemen from the United States and Canada, had floated 800 yards offshore since Monday, when military-backed authorities, in a direct challenge to the U.N. mission, refused it a berth.

The troop deployment by 200 U.S. soldiers marked the beginning in earnest of the U.N. mission. About 100 U.N. personnel arrived earlier as an advance operation.

The withdrawal followed anti-U.N. demonstrations.

U.S. Sen. Bob Graham said Cedras refused to guarantee the safety of the troops aboard the Harlan County. Cedras also refused to resign by Friday.

Graham, D-Fla., told reporters that Haitian resistance has put the U.N. plan "into doubt."

He said Washington remains fully committed to the plan.

Haitian legislators have expressed doubt that they can pass a series of laws needed for the democratic transition. Aristide's foreign minister said Monday night that the elected leader would not delay his return.

The port incident Monday was the first indication of serious resistance to the U.N. mission, a spokesman for the U.N. force, Army Maj. Jim Hinnant, told the Associated Press.

Since then, "everything has come to a severe slowdown," Hinnant said from a suburban Petionville hotel room. "Certain doors are not being opened. Calls are not being responded to."

Hinnant is one of 40 American soldiers in Haiti, part of an advance team that was supposed to grow to include 700 U.S. troops by month's end. That appears unlikely now.

Less than 24 hours before the USS Faifax County was scheduled to leave for Haiti on Wednesday, the Pentagon cancelled the trip. The Pentagon said Hinnant's advance mission itself may leave Haiti by Monday if progress is not made.

Also Tuesday, a television crew from WSVN-TV in Miami was arrested and threatened with execution before being ordered out of the country, a station representative told the Associated Press.

Hazing cost two coaches their HS jobs

HATFIELD (AP) — Two soccer coaches were ousted at a public school Tuesday for allowing what parents describe as a traditional team hazing by older players who tug up the underpants of younger teammates.

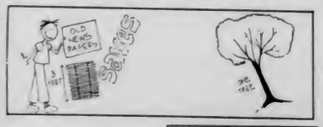
David Angier, an assistant district attorney in Hampshire County, said his office was investigating the incident.

Linda Driscoll, superintendent of Smith Academy in Hatfield, said she asked both coaches to resign in the wake of the Oct. 5 incident on a sports bus. She said about 15 students would also be suspended for up to two days.

The coaches, Greg Bergstrom of the varsity squad and Keith Urkiel of the junior varsity, were both in their first season of coaching the boys' teams at the combined high school and junior high school. They had no teaching duties.

Bergstrom's phone number was unlisted. Urkiel did not immediately return a phone message.

The superintendent said the incident occurred on the Smith Academy bus returning from a game against Mohawk Trail Regional High School in Buckland.



"It involved physical contact and intimidation," Driscoll said. "The coaches did not properly supervise or intervene."

She said nearly all 35 players on the varsity and junior varsity teams were involved. "It's just a very emotionally sensitive issue," she added.

Parents said the incident involved a long-accepted practice of giving "wedgies" to younger players after an away victory — pulling up the waist band of their underwear as far as it will go.

In a letter to school officials, 43 parents of soccer players called for leniency toward the players who were responsible and the coaches. The parents said they were sorry if any younger players suffered pain or embarrassment.

However, they said, "Many of us who played sports in high school or college experienced similar incidents, and are confused when we hear this type of activity described in criminal terms."

Demolition Man explodes on screen

Wesley Snipes is getting some action in the explosive action drama, Boiling Point.

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Sylvester Stallone is having a very good year. On the heels of his "comeback kid" turn in last summer's Cliffhanger, comes the vastly entertaining Demolition Man, a film that delivers this year's most amazing special effect (No, not Wesley's golden locks).

Defying reality, director Marco Brambilla and screenwriter Daniel Waters (Batman Returns) pull off the impossible. They make Los Angeles nice.

Los Angeles 2033 is a politically correct Eden. Strangers on the street wish themselves "Joy Joy" feelings and to have a "Happy Happy" day. The Verbal Morality Act has abolished obscenities. Crime has become null and void with the last recorded murder occuring 16 years ago.

And into this utopia blasts Simon Phoenix (Wesley Snipes), "the 20th Century's most dangerous criminal." As he wreaks havoc upon a helpless society (cops no longer carry guns), the only alternative is to awaken the "20th Century's most dangerous cop" John Spartan (Stallone). The two then wage a futuristic grudge match among the unsuspecting populace.

It all sounds so bombastic but Waters' script plays the proceedings mainly for laughs, for Demolition Man is at once an action film and a parody of those testosterone-induced blast fests.

When Stallone's Spartan awakens from a cryogenic freeze (he was incarcerated in 1996 upon suspicion of killing hostages in a botched raid on Phoenix's lair) he learns that through subliminal rehabilitation Phoenix has become endowed with the info necessary to gain control of the city. He, on the other hand, now possesses the skills of a seamstress. At one point, unwinding from a long day of mayhem, this action hero actually grabs a ball of yarn and makes a sweater.

It's these absurdities mixed among the Joel Silver-produced explosives that makes Demolition Man fun.

Sandra Bullock, as a 21st century cop addicted to 20th century pop culture, gleans the most from her pointed references to the blockbuster entertainments of the present. Sometime in the span that Spartan was out, Arnold Schwarzeneggar has become President (thanks to the 61st Amendment which, due to Arnold's popularity, allowed foreign citizens to run for office). That joke could just hang on the surface, but Waters' script goes further allowing Spartan a reply ribbing Ronald Reagan (the President whose era of greed gave birth to the action film behemoths).

Inside jokes aside, the main event here is the Stallone-Snipes confrontation and the two actors relish their roles. Stallone has travelled these grounds he now mimics and he successfully plays up his thought-lost action persona. With a glint in his eye, he delivers each one-liner with the same "Yo Adrian" gravel-throat menace that made his early films such 80s cultural icons. He's run the parody route before (unintentionally in 1989's Tango and Cash) but here he succeeds, generating mucho laughs from his macho posturing.

Snipes, through his onscreen criminal acts, nearly steals the picture from Stallone as he chomps through the scenery with gusto. Never bowing to play the same persona twice, Snipes takes the role of stock bad guy to the nth degree, slinging the one-liners and piling the bodies with devilish authority. As he views the ultra-safe future, he's like a kid in a candy store (albeit a very disturbed kid) who's allowed the chance to run rampant without pause. Snipes thus plays the part with such manic intensity that his character's over-the-top name Simon Phoenix, is almost excusable.

The iron-clad action films continue to stampede (reports of a Die Hard III and IV are on the horizon), so Waters finds strong metal to tarnish here. With fun performances by Snipe and Stallone, as well as action sequences that dazzle, Demolition Man wows with its explosions as it asks you to laugh at them as well. B+

Cool Runnings A Disney comedy about the "true story of the Jamaican bobsled team" circa 1988, this films runs not cool, but ingratiating. The stereotypes are rampant, from the dreadlocked "No Problemmm" portrayal of the Jamaican participants to the fascist regimes of rival bobsledders, and the comedy is transparent. Though Doug E. Doug adds fresh comic relief and Leon achieves well deserved sympathy in a pathos rejecting role as a failed sprinter turned to bobsledding, it's not enough to warrant attention to another Rocky knockoff, true story or not. In his supporting role as an ex-bobsledder, John Candy gives new meaning to the term "slumming it." You want true Disney entertainment; rent Aladdin. Keep these Cool Runnings on ice. D+

Wild improv comedy troupe achieves 'mission'

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Creative comedy and wit were the order of the night as Student Valley Productions presented comedy troupe Mission: IMPROVable Friday night at the Hampden Theatre in Southwest.

"Our mission is to entertain you," announced Brian Jewell, troupe member, to the crowd of about 30, before the start of the rather innovative performance. "We love weird, wild suggestions."

What Jewell meant, is that unlike the common stand-up act where many a time a comedian will simply harangue the crowd for an hour and a half, IMPROVable's quest involved the audience to a high degree. It wasn't just a sit-back-enjoy-the-show kind of thing, although it was enjoyable.

They asked the audience to suggest elements they could enact, such as soap opera characters, moods, scenes, and "Party Quirks." In this skit, the host of a "party" (played by Carrie Christner, who got my vote for funniest performer) had to decipher "just what the hell was wrong with her guests." One thought she was an elephant, another spat when she talked, and a third was a compulsive liar, just to give you an idea. I guess you had to be there.

"It's about getting as many laughs as you can, cheap or expensive," Christner said, summing up the fun of improv comedy quite well.

Student Valley Productions, which was started in the mid-1980s as a forum for student-written theater, introduced Mission: IMPROVable two years ago with the help of a young intern named Katie Cope. Its current members, eight in all (many of whose majors have nothing to do with theater), are rather elated that the program has come about like it has.

"This came from a seed of an idea and I'm really glad it has gone as far and as well as it has," exclaimed Linda Carranza.

What's so clever about the routine is that the performers had done absolutely no rehearsal or preparation whatsoever for the lines they uttered; they "winged" it, branching the act off from what the audience gave them at the beginning. They couldn't even anticipate what each other was going to say or do.

"It's good that you don't have to memorize any lines," Christner said. "But then, you don't have any lines to depend on, either."

Nonetheless, the gags were consistently worth more than a simple chuckle. "World's Worst" had the audience supplying job titles, and several members of the group had their individual renditions of what the "world's worst" lawyer, for example, would be.

One suggested profession was a proctologist. Heh, heh. World's worst administrative system, with Whitmore the winner, could have surely come next, except they didn't have any red tape handy. In fact, no props at all.

"It's one of the most difficult types of acting or performing, because if you're not quick on your feet, you'll flop," said Norm Laviolette, a member of the production team. He noted that many well-known laugh-getters such as John Belushi, Chevy Chase, Dan Aykroyd, and Jane Curtin, all of "Saturday Night Live" fame, began their comedy careers with improvised theater.

"It's one big trust exercise," said Gail Bishop, another troupe member. As far as drawing a blank on stage was concerned, "It's every actor's nightmare, but we don't like to talk about it because it could happen again," she said.

"It's rare to blank out but it happens," added Kevin Nessman. "No one wants to lose their sense of spontaneity."

The troupe has been laboring on a parody of the pilot episode of "Star Trek: the Next Generation," and plans to call it "Star Trip: the Next Mutilation." I wonder if the wackos at Mad Magazine will beat 'em to the punch.

The production, to occur sometime in November, will send all proceeds to benefit the Midwest Flood Relief Fund, and those wishing to get a reduced admission price can do so by bringing in canned goods to aid the Western Massachusetts Food Bank.

The troupe, who in June went to Toronto for a comedy pilgrimage, had the opportunity to meet the "Kids in the Hall" (the HBO squish-your-head guys) and the "Chumps," another improv group.

They added that since the "Kids" are on their last season, someone has to fill the spot. They already have a show planned out: "Comedy Abhors: a Vacuum." I'm not sure what it means, but I know that if it's anything like their show Friday night, it's worth the trip.

Said Bishop, "I think IMPROV is a way to be Peter Pan and say we'll never grow up."

Benefits go by wayside

Democratic bickering causes problems

By ALAN FRAM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Bickering House Democrats have let lapse extra benefits given to the 60,000 Americans who each week exhaust unemployment compensation even though the problem is worse than when Congress first created the additional coverage.

Party leaders say they have resolved an impasse over financing the program and expect to begin moving legislation through Congress this week.

The lapse has caused embarrassment among Democrats and exposed them to ridicule from Republicans.

With divided Democrats unable to get a bill renewing the benefits to the House floor for more than two weeks, the old version expired Oct. 2.

That means that since that day, the 60,000 Americans who exhaust the basic 26 weeks of jobless coverage every week have been unable to apply for additional benefits.

The program had never lapsed since it was established in November 1991.

The program was renewed twice in 1992. It was also renewed last March under President Clinton.

Top Democrats said Tuesday they believed they have solved their internal impasse and would move a bill this week.

The delay came in the face of an embarrassing statistic for Democrats: there are about 400,000 more long term unemployed Amercans today than there were when the extra benefits were initiated.

"This is a Democratic program and you have to do it," said a frustrated Rep. Barbara Kennelly, D-Conn., a member of the House Ways and Means Committee, which oversees the program.

In the aftermath of the fight over Clinton's deficit reduction bill, Democrats leery of raising taxes have found it hard to find palatable ways to pay for extra unemployment coverage.

"There's no question they were attempting, issue by issue, to embarrass George Bush in an election year," Rep. Bill Archer of Texas, ranking Republican on the House ways oand Means Committee, said Tuesday. "With that situation changed, the emergency nature of it has disappeared into the winds."

"They should be ashamed to be talking about it," said Kennelly.

The bill the House considers this week will retroactively cover people whose basic jobless benefits have expired since Oct. 2.

Tens of thousands of long-term jobless Americans will have to make do until they receive their first retroactive checks.

According to the latest Labor department statistics, there were 1.75 million people last month who were jobless at least 26 weeks. That's 20.5 percent of all unemployed workers. Both are near historic highs.

Democratic leaders said Tuesday they decided to try ending the controversy by eliminating the welfare provision. This will leave a smaller bill providing extra coverage only through Jan. 1.

Alleged teen killer held over family's murder

By ANNE STUART
Associated Press

WAREHAM — A 15-year-old boy accused of shooting his parents and his 11-year-old sister to death was ordered held without bail Tuesday and faced another court hearing on whether to be tried as an adult.

Gerard McCra III pleaded innocent in Wareham District Court to juvenile murder charges and Judge Baron Martin ordered a psychological exam.

McCra was arrested Sunday after his father, Gerard, 35, his mother Merle, 37, and his sister, Melanie, were found dead in a car behind the Rochester home of the youth's grandparents. The family had been living in a basement apartment while building a house of their own.

Although the younger McCra had a reputation as a troublemaker, Rochester Police Chief Walter Denham said there was no warning of the killings.

"There was no indication that he was experiencing emotional problems or that he had thought of doing anything serious," Denham said.

Denham confirmed police were called to the McCra home three months ago, but he said it was because the teen-ager had run away.

"His parents never indicated to us that they were afraid of him," Denham said. "He had left home and run away. I picked him up and brought him home."

Denham said the only other incident he was aware of was a fight the younger McCra boy had with a neighborhood boy over a hockey stick.

McCra's attorney, Michael Zeman, said the boy was taking a prescribed drug that is used to control hyperactivity.

"What other drugs he's been taking of a prescribed nature I have no idea," Zeman said.

"He's very upset. He's distraught. He's tearful. He lost people who are very important and very close to him," Zeman said.

Denham said the youth was calm and cool.

"It's my understanding he spent the night at home. The bodies probably were in the vehicle at that time," Denham said.

McCra is scheduled to return to court next Tuesday for a hearing mandated under state law on whether or not he should be tried as an adult, where he would face life imprisonment if convicted of murder.

Along the Color Line: "Beyond Diversity"

Dr. Manning
MARABLE

For half a century, we have pursued the goal of "diversity" in higher education, with at best mixed and uneven results. In the 1950s, liberal educators would say with pride that they were committed to the goal of a "color blind" environment. I distinctly recall professors saying to me that they "could not remember" whether this or that student was "a Negro." They fully embraced the liberal perspective of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., that individuals should be judged "not by the color of their skin but the content of their character." It speaks volumes about the problems inherent in such a statement, when one realizes that black conservatives like Shelby Steele can simplistically advance the same words today, but for a reactionary purpose.

We should all agree that "color blindness" is our goal. As the great Reggae artist Bob Marley of Jamaica observed, "Until the color of a man's skin is of no greater consequence than the color of his eyes, there will be war."

But the question should be, how do we get there? How can we "deconstruct" race? We cannot get there by pretending that "race" and "color" no longer matter, that they have magically declined in significance since the sixties. In a racist society, color symbolizes the inequality of power relations, the ownership of property and resources, between various groups and classes. To end racial prejudice, we must restructure the power relations between people of color and upper-to-middle income whites. This means that we must pursue a "color-conscious" strategy to create the conditions where color is one day irrelevant to determining the positions of power, educational access, health care and to other opportunities of daily life.

In the 1970s and 1980s, the ideal of color blindness gave way to what could be termed "symbolic representation." Liberal educators believed that the recipe for cultural diversity would be achieved by bringing representatives of a new spectrum of interests into the academy — women, racial minorities, physically disabled people, lesbians, gays, as well as others. Programs were established to create new academic courses in women's studies, Black Studies, Chicano Studies, gay and lesbian studies, and Asian American Studies. Minorities and women were "symbolically represented" with their appointments as counsellors and college recruiters. Multicultural student services centers were established to address perceived concerns of the students of color.

These reforms should have represented a beginning, rather than the end, of a process of education reconstruction on issues of social and cultural difference within the academy. Instead, we have somehow lost our way. And at many colleges and universities, we are actually moving backward.

One reason is that women and racial minorities were usually hired and subsequently located in the bureaucratic margins of academic institutions, rather than within real centers of power. There were few deliberate programs which actually tried to identify scholars of color and/or female faculty with administrative abilities, to mentor and cultivate them, and to advance them forward. At some institutions, minority faculty occupied a revolving door position, usually at the designed ranks of instructor or assistant professor, never to be tenured or reappointed.

Transcending the old, restrictive boundaries of "diversity" means going beyond the old language of "minority groups" within our colleges and in society as a whole. We must settle for nothing less than the fundamental redefinition of "mainstream," to be fully inclusive of the broadest range of cultural perspectives, religious and philosophical values, languages and social traditions which reflect all of America.

Going beyond diversity means fostering a cultural dialogue between the representatives of various ethnic groups on campuses which leads to exchange, sharing, and cultural synthesis. Universities must go out of their way to create spaces for people of color and other oppressed groups to express themselves culturally, and to dialogue with others. As things now stand, too often we find students of various ethnic backgrounds relating to each other at a polite social distance, never really learning about the other groups' experiences. We only begin to appreciate our own culture, when we take the time to learn what is valuable in someone else's culture.

Going beyond diversity in higher education will require a change in the power relations between people of color, women, and the traditional elites which dominate our universities. By redefining the mission and core content of our education, we can begin to move from the margins to the center.

New officers to lead BSU

By MARTIN JONES
Collegian Staff

The UMass Black Student Union is beginning its second year with a new office, a new budget, and new leadership.

Junior Shomwa Shamapande, a junior legal studies major, has been elected president of the organization, and Jennifer Crenshaw, a senior majoring in STPEC and Afro-Am, was elected as vice-president.

President Shamapande said he plans to increase the organizational membership and provide support for other minority groups on campus.

"We wish to enhance organizations which have a direct impact on the social and educational status of minority students at the university."

Vice-President Jennifer Crenshaw feels strong about the BSU this year and says that it is time to "bring the organization to its next level." She anticipates a productive year for the group and plans to network with other minority organizations on campus and around the local area.

Crenshaw, who has been a member of the group since its inception during the spring 1992 semester, describes the BSU as "a nucleus for the students to gather to," and says the BSU is "critical" to the Black community at UMass.

STEVEN PEDULLA / COLLEGIAN
The 1993-94 Black Student Union Executive Council.

Last year in October, the BSU leadership helped to negotiate a settlement of a racial crisis that followed the assault upon a Black R.A.

Penny Cameron, who served as one of the negotiators and presently chairs the political action committee, says the BSU will now gear its political focus toward building coalitions with political allies on campus. Some of the groups mentioned were the BMCP, Cape Verdean Student Alliance, the Haitian American Students Assoc., and the African Students Assoc.

BSU officers are encouraging all new students to participate in the group.

Wal-Mart nabbed of wrongdoing

Judge rules in favor of small business owners

By JAMES JEFFERSON
Associated Press

CONWAY, Ark—Wal-Mart Stores Inc. illegally tried to force competitors out of business with the same policy that made it the nation's largest retailer, a judge ruled Tuesday.

Judge David Reynolds said Wal-Mart violated state law by selling some drugs, and health and beauty aids below cost at its store in Conway. He ordered an end to the practice and awarded the plaintiffs, three independent Arkansas pharmacies, nearly $300,000 in damages.

The decision was the first predatory pricing ruling against Wal-Mart, which critics have blamed for the demise of many long-established merchants in small towns and cities nationwide. It was unclear whether the decision might lead to similar rulings elsewhere.

Wal-Mart said it would appeal to the Arkansas Supreme Court. Robert K. Rhoads, Wal-Mart's general counsel, warned of higher prices at stores throughout Arkansas.

Wal-Mart officials said during a two-day trial in August that some items were priced below cost to draw customers, not drive local druggists out of business.

Reynolds based his ruling in part on Wal-Mart's in-store displays comparing its prices to those of local retailers. The judge also noted Wal-Mart had different prices in different markets, and he pointed out the company's advertised policy of meeting or beating the competition without regard to cost.

The lead plaintiff claimed victory for small, independent retailers nationwide.

"It's important to beat Wal-Mart. They were literally driving the small people out of business," said druggist Dwayne Coode, who owns American Drugs in Conway.

Coode said he got fed up with trying to compete with Wal-Mart's pricing and sued two years ago. "There's no way anyone can keep their prices down with Wal-Mart and survive," he said.

Investors apparently shrugged off the decision and the possibility that it might lead to more lawsuits against Wal-Mart by smaller storeowners. Wal-Mart stock closed at $25.75 a share on the New York Stock Exchange, down 75 cents.

Authors of new book argue origin of "Dixie"

By PHILIP RAWLS
Associated Press

MONTGOMERY, Ala.—"Dixie," the anthem that was a fixture at political rallies 'away down South' for 100 years, may have been written by a black family—and Yankees, no less.

A new book from Smithsonian Institution Press seeks to dispel the popular notion that the song was written by white minstrel performer Dam Emmett.

"Way Up North in Dixie: A Black Family's Claim to the Confederate Anthem" agrees with other history books that Emmett made "Dixie" a hit when he performed it on Broadway in 1859.

But authors Howard and Judith Sacks say Emmett learned the song from the Snowden family of black musicians in his hometown of Mount Vernon, Ohio.

If the research is correct, "it's a lesson in the irony of our history and the naivete of those who attach special meanings to a song," said William Ferris, co-editor of the "Encyclopedia of Southern Culture."

When the Civil War broke out, "Dixie" was played at Jefferson Davis's inauguration in Montgomery and was heard at Southern political rallies for the next 100 years. It started disappearing from the political landscape after white Democrats began courting black voters in the 1970s.

Sacks, chairman of the anthropology department at Kenyon College near Mont Vernon, said his quest for the origin of "Dixie" started after a friend found a cemetery marker for brothers Dan and Len Snowden that said: "They taught 'Dixie' to Dan Emmett."

Research was difficult because the last member of the family died in 1923. But Sacks found the Snowden family home and next door was a woman whose grandfather administered the estates of the last family members. She had kept musical instruments, a family album and a box of correspondence that provided details of the Snowden family.

Sacks said that the family lived across the street from a tavern and stagecoach stop and started entertaining travelers in 1850 with a style that later became parodied in minstrel troupe in 1843. But he returned to Mount Vernon often to visit relatives who lived next door to the Snowdens.

Sacks said that the matriarch of the Snowden family, Ellen Cooper Snowden, was born a slave in Maryland in 1817. When she was 10, her owner freed her and sent her to Mount Vernon on the Ohio frontier to work for his cousins.

Historians who credit the song to Emmett agree it was rewritten many times to suit various causes. But through all of the rewrites, historians say the opening line and the chorus have remained the same.

So why would a free slave "wish I was in the land of cotton?"

The reason, Sacks said, is the paucity of other blacks in the area — none of Mrs. Snowden's seven children found marriage partners — and the loss of contact with Mrs. Snowden's family in Maryland.

Crew club starts strong

Head of the Charles looms in two weeks

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Correspondent

With a strong showing two weeks ago in Lowell at the Head of the Textile River, the University of Massachusetts crew team started off the fall season. The second place finish for the women was the beginning of their defense of the Division II National Championship.

Both the men and women's teams are experienced and deep in talented newcomers. The women's first eight is led by Kim Alhowik, Jesse Fountas, and Heather Witalisz, all returning from last year's National Championship team. The second place finish was a sign of good things to come for the woman's varsity team.

The men's first eight is led by seniors Bryan Swatz, Jason West, coxswain Jen Bragg, and president of the crew, Rob Malionek. First-year varsity coach Rick Kelleher comes to the UMass crew team after coaching for three years at the University of Pennsylvania.

"We should do very well this year," said West. "I also fully expect the women to again win the national championship."

The freshmen are coached by experienced personnel. Men's coach Stewart Stokes was a coxswain for the U.S. National team which competed in Prague, Czechoslovakia. Deanna Cook, the women's coach, was a member of last year's National Championship team.

UMass has this upcoming weekend off to gear up for the biggest race of the year at the Head of the Charles River.

"The Charles Regatta is one of the biggest spectator events in the country," West said. "Everyone wants to be on the first eight."

Even though crew is not a varsity sport at UMass it is taken very seriously in New England both by crew members and spectators.

Members from both UMass squads said they realize the competition from Georgetown, Temple, and Holy Cross will be fierce and look forward to a successful fall and spring season.

Team looks to repeat in intramural football

By JORMA KANSANEN
Collegian Correspondent

In the modern day sports world, pressure is put on teams and individuals not just to get to the top, but to stay there. The idea of repeating as champions of a given sport is not a new one, look at the Boston Celtics of the 1950s and 60s.

But in this age of hype and glory, due to the flooding crescent of the television and advertising markets, more than ever emphasis is directed towards winning.

But what about everyone else?

One of the more popular intramural sports of the fall is flag football, and this year the sport has returning champs. Appropriately named In It 2 Win It Again, this team is looking into the face of this dilemma of pressure to repeat.

Or are they?

"A lot of it has to do with experience," said co-captain Joel Lesser. "Most teams have only three or four good players. We have nine good athletes who can play both ways, any position."

Led by quarterback Derek Dana, a former UMass baseball catcher, and speedy co-captain Jim Bastille, the team started out of the gates quickly. Teamwork on both sides of the ball was evident in its first two shutout wins, 48-0 over Wicked Ale and 28-0 against The Saltines.

"We got a pretty quick team," said Lesser. "The biggest thing, I think, in this game is definitely speed and defense."

"We only lost three players from last year's team. Stay healthy...and I think we got a chance."

In other flag football action, Sigma Phi Epsilon's "A" and "B" teams sit on top of the Fraternity Division with 3-0 starts, while Theta Chi is hanging tough with a similar record in Trojan League action.

In the Independent Division, Who's Next (3-0) and The Dogg Pound (3-0) have emerged as early favorites in Berkshire and Brook League play, respectively.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It's gonna be a great year!"
– Louis Scholnick
Revenge of the Nerds

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A quarrel could shake you as stormy issues arise. Keep your temper in check and patiently work out a compromise. Taking on too much work could lead to burnout. Relax with friends tonight.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A pact is quickly formed when two energetic individuals meet. You may find that a promise of secrecy makes your arrangement extra sweet! An evening stroll could spark romance.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You instinctively know how to persuade others to lend, share or give. A tender gesture or thoughtful gift makes romance especially happy. Getting involved with a humanitarian cause spurs you to greatness.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): New doors open, allowing you access to funds, valuable resources or favors. Do not force your way in — diplomatic nudging lends just the right touch now! Teamwork is favored on the home front.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Be prepared to make some tough financial choices. A "no frills" romance may make your love feel more pure. Good news arrives by phone, fax or mail. Save money for a rainy day.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Your popularity peaks as you display good will and cooperation. Others become more giving. Avoid acting on impulse if urged to invest in something unusual.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Ask a partner to participate in the decision-making process. You have a good head for financial matters and may one day enjoy great wealth. Take your time with important projects.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A day to double-check financial accounts and make certain your information is accurate. Someone needs reminding of your friendship. A humorous card or brief note works wonder.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A good day to exchange news — or views — with people in a position to help you. You can broadcast your plans near and far with good results. A loved one shares your dreams.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do not let impulsive purchases set you back; instead, pay your bills promptly. People in a position to pull strings for you warm to your honest approach. Don't leave loved ones wondering about your feelings.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Withdrawing from other people may seem like a good idea now. Resist the urge to go it alone. You will find the support you need if you speak openly to your friends.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Struggling too hard to make a point is counterproductive. Be on time to appointments. New professional and financial gains come from using all your skills.

shoulders of Kevin Stevens, Tom Barasso and Co.

Montreal Canadiens: The Habs will once again rely on the play of St. Patrick Roy and one of the most talented defenses in the league to be successful. Head coach Jaques Demers will rely heavily on the trio of Kirk Muller, Brian Bellows, and Vincent Damphousse to lead the Canadiens' offense as they try to repeat as Stanley Cup champs.

Boston Bruins: The trend in Bruin hockey has changed. After years of reliance on defense, the new ..rte in Beantown is netting goals. Next to the Lemieux ..ne, the Adam Oates-Cam Neely-Joe Juneau unit is among the most potent combinations in the league.

Newly re-signed Ray Bourque will be called on to lead an otherwise weak defense again. Early signs look good as the Jon Casey era begins in Boston. He has been a great goalie for a bad team for too long. Good things are yet to come.

Quebec Nordiques: Their top guns can run with anybody, but they leave nobody to protect the fort. Letting go of Ron Hextall in favor of Stephane Fiset could prove embarassing for GM Pierre Page.

Buffalo Sabres: Overrated. With Alexander Mogilny still recovering from a broken leg, Pat LaFontaine will be forced to produce too much. A weak defense and the fact that Grant Fuhr is looking into nursing homes will lead to a dismal outlook for the 1993-94 season.

Hartford Whalers: There is reason to be hopeful in insuranceland, but this will not be the year that the Whales are saved.

Ottawa Senators: The addition of talented and now very rich center Alexandre Daigle will produce dividends in the long run but his lack of experience and a supporting cast will make for another long year in Canada's capital city.

Atlantic Division

New York Islanders: A return to glory in Long Island. Pierre Turgeon has finally emerged as a bona fide superstar. Ron Hextall will bring back memories of Billy Smith. With the best young defense in the league in front of him, Hextall could put up 30+ wins again.

New York Rangers: Overrated. Fiery new head coach Mike Keenan will be an improvement over Roger Nielson, but they are too old and injury prone to push their Long Island neighbors.

Washington Capitals: Their strong D will keep them in games, but they lack the offense to put them over the top. Dave Poulin was a solid acquisition, but he's aging quickly. They need a sniper to contend.

New Jersey Devils: It's tough to imagine this bunch making the playoffs. Stephane Richer is on the downside of his career, and Claude Lemieux is headed in the same direction.

Tampa Bay Lightning: The Lightning hope to show that last season's signs of promise weren't just a flash in the pan. They will benefit from being in the same division as Florida, but it will be a while before there are playoffs in the Thunder Dome.

Florida Panthers: This team has more deficiencies than a Yugo dealership. A probable repeat of last season's Senators. Too bad for movie mogul-owner Wayne Huizenga. Nice jersey, bad team.

grams in the country. Ever. The accomplishments of Carolina Coach Dean Smith and Kentucky Coach Rick Pitino and their schools are endless. The schools have won a combined nine national championships (UNC four, UK five).

The Dean Smith Center, more commonly known as the Dean Dome and the home of Carolina, seats 21,572, and will be the site of the Madness on Tobacco Road.

The Wildcats will use Memorial Gymnasium, their practice court, which still seats more than 10,000.

Both North Carolina and Kentucky expect at least 10,000 fans each that Sunday night.

Despite the differences between the three programs on the basketball court historically, it can be said that for what Coach Calipari has done with the Minutemen for the past three seasons, UMass rightfully deserves the spotlight for its achievements on the court.

Questions still remain, though, about the commitment of the fans. Obviously, UMass has a fan base, but is it large enough to fill the 9,493 seats of the William D. Mullins Center for the Madness and compete with that of Carolina and Kentucky?

"ESPN has said that the Last Game in the Cage had the best scenery for a game that they have ever done, and that's something special for our fans," said UMass Assistant Coach John Robic. "It was a sea of white [students wore "Final Rage" t-shirts]. Our fans have never disappointed."

So now it remains to be seen. The Minutemen have done their part on and off the court, earning the right to be grouped with the likes of Carolina and Kentucky.

As for the fans, Halloween night is their chance to shine, to answer the call from the Minutemen and fill Mullins so they can be considered in the same class as those that sell out the Dean Dome and Rupp Arena night in and night out.

defeat Oregon, the previously undefeated Cal team squandered a 13-point fourth quarter lead and allowed two Husky touchdowns in the final 2:06 on its way to a 24-23 loss.

BATTLE OF THE HOLIES: Fresh off its victory over undermanned and overscheduled Pitt, Notre Dame, now 6-0 and ranked No. 3, must travel to Provo, Utah, and take on the Brigham Young Fighting Mormons, er, Cougars.

BYU is coming off a demoralizing loss to UCLA. I'm not sure, can you call a 68-14 thumping a loss if you're the No. 19 team in the nation. The Irish will definitely have their hands full this weekend. They are not only going up against a high-powered offense out to prove a point, but also an entire denomination.

The Catholics have too much speed for the Mormons and will prevail, 54-41.

Speaking of Notre Dame, with all the Golden Helmets floating around at McGuirk, UMass is starting to resemble South Bend.

TOO BAD THEY PLAY IN THE ACC: How impressive are the North Carolina Tarheels this year? Very. With a 45-35 win over Wake Forest this weekend, the 'Heels upped their record to 6-1 with that loss coming at the hands of FSU.

UNC relied on a couple of big Johnsons to get the job done against the Wake. Curtis had 15 carries for 132 yards and three TDs and Leon rushed for 119 yards on 16 carries and one TD. Easily the best backfield in the nation.

Look for Wisconsin, under head coach Barry Alvarez, to wrap up a bowl bid this weekend when they move to 6-0 on the year with a win over Purdue.

This summer Rothenberger participated in the 1993 U.S. Olympic festival, where she competed against future teammates Jenn Salisbury, Tara Jelley, and Holly Hockenbrock. She credits playing sweeper at the festival with improving her defensive skills. Rothenberger admits to thinking about making the national team, but considers it a long range goal.

"It's in the back of my head," Rothenberger said. "It's a goal that would be really nice to achieve, but right now I'd just like to get through college."

Rothenberger and the Minutewomen will try to extend their winning streak to 11 this afternoon (3:30 Totman field) against the Green Wave of Dartmouth.

years before coming to Amherst.

The beat went on for the Minutewomen yesterday as Nicole Roberts and Rachel LeDuc each had a goal and an assist, while Melissa Mitchell added a goal.

Mitchell put UMass on the board in the 34th minute, when Roberts, after a restart, charged into the right corner and won a loose ball. With her left foot she sent a pass to the center, where Mitchell one timed it passed Big Red goalkeeper Sue DeLong. It was Mitchell's fifth tally of the year.

"That goal is an example of what I preach," Rudy said. "To follow up all shots, chase balls in deep and look to drop a cross when you get deep. Nicole did it perfectly and Mitchell made a great play to one-time the wet ball."

The 1-0 UMass lead held through halftime and into the 54th minute, when Roberts did it herself. The sophomore, who now has 10 goals on the season, picked up a pass from LeDuc about 30 yards in front of the net, broke between two Big Red defenders, drove to the right of an out-of-the-net DeLong and slid the shot into the open goal.

Cornell's Amy Duesing beat UMass' keeper Briana Scurry in the 66th minute. It was only the sixth goal Scurry has allowed in 13 starts this season. Her goals against average is now 0.41.

LeDuc rounded out the scoring when she drove a ball in from 12 yards out in the 79th minute.

"Rachel's goal was a key one for us," Rudy said. "It locked it up. We had some great performances today, everyone played well. I really liked Roberts out there. She did some nice work, played very maturely, kept running and tactically played very well.

"She made nice choices out there," Rudy said. "If I was playing today, those were the decisions I would have made."

When you just won No. 150, you don't have to be modest.

Minutewoman victory sets milestone for Rudy

ARAM COMIEAN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team defeated Cornell 3-1 yesterday at Garber Field, earning Coach Jim Rudy his 150th career win.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Jim Rudy yesterday received a bouquet of flowers and a bottle of fine wine from 25 women, all of whom are 20 years younger than him. And his wife was not even jealous.

Does the University of Massachusetts women's soccer coach have a particularly understanding wife? Maybe, but the fact that Rudy had just rung up his 150th women's career coaching victory might have had something to do with it.

The Minutewomen (10-2-1), ranked No. 7 nationally, helped Rudy achieve the milestone with 3-1 victory over Cornell.

"When coaches begin to get high up on the career win list it is for only two reasons," said Rudy, who became only the fourth coach in NCAA history to reach the 150 win plateau. "One, they've been around a long time or two, they've had some pretty good players.

"I've definitely had one of those things," the youthful Rudy smiled.

It was a collective effort of 11 pretty good players yesterday, which helped UMass from surviving a natural letdown following Saturday's big win over Hartford and a miserable, dark and rainy afternoon.

"We had a real complete game," Rudy said. "The crew was able to focus on playing and pay attention out there. We saw Providence, sky high after defeating Duke and Hartford, go into Army last weekend and lose.

"We took note of that. A wise person learns not only from her own mistakes but the mistakes of others," he said.

Only a coach with 150 victories is allowed to use fortune cookie sayings like that. Rudy, now 150-41-19, is in his sixth season at UMass, where he has a 76-23-8 mark. He coached both the men's and women's teams at the University of Central Florida for seven

Call to fans: pack Mullins on Halloween

Basketball tradition runs pretty deep in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and Lexington, Kentucky. Residents start snacking on basketballs come November and by March, the journey to the Final Four, where ever it may be, begins.

But this season both the Tar Heels, the 1992-93 NCAA National Champions, and the Wildcats will be joined by a third program which is fighting its way into the prime-time spotlight. Yes, none other than the University of Massachusetts.

IN THE PAINT — Art Pimpleton on UMass Minutemen Basketball

College basketball teams across the nation start their season with Midnight Madness, the first team practice allowed by NCAA regulations.

The rule states that a program cannot hold an official practice until Nov. 1. So fans who have been anxiously awaiting the march to the madness that occurs some four months down the road pack their home arenas to welcome the new hoop season at midnight on Nov. 1.

This season, ESPN is broadcasting the inaugural practice of these three teams, a first-of-its-kind event. The higher-ups at the Total Sports Network invited UNC and Kentucky along with the Minutemen to take part in the festivities.

Volleyball loses to A-10 leader

By CANDICE FLEMMING

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team won a game against Alantic-10 leader George Washington, but still lost the match three games to one Saturday night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

The Minutewomen continued their offensive struggles, hitting for only a .087 percentage in the match.

George Washington started the match red hot as the Colonials completely dominated the Minutewomen offensively, hitting for a .688 percentage in the first game. This domination led to a 12-0 lead before the Minutewomen could muster a point for themselves. It proved to be the only point the Minutewomen would score in the first game as they lost 1-15.

The second game of the match started out much like the first as the Colonials jumped out to a 8-0 lead. The Minutewomen didn't give up however and pulled within four points cutting the lead to 11-7.

But once again GW took charge offensively, winning four out of the next five points to close the game with a 15-8 score.

With a two-game-to-none lead, the Colonials looked liked they would sweep the match and win 3-0. But once again the Minutewomen didn't give up and jumped out to a 5-1 lead. GW would come back to tie it at nine and take a 12-11 lead, but UMass scored the next four points to win the game.

Cass Anderson served the last four points for the Minutewomen, which included an ace.

In the fourth game, GW started strong once again, taking a 9-3 lead. UMass stayed with the Colonials, winning four of the next six points to make it a 11-7 game. But the Colonials hitting helped them win the next four points to win the game 15-7 and the match 3-1.

UMass was led by freshmen Susan Maga, who had 13 kills, and Kim Mizner who had seven blocks. The loss dropped the Minutewomen's record to 8-7 on the year and 1-4 in the A-10.

Rothenberger making impact

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

It is a rare feat for a coach to recruit a freshman who can step into the starting lineup and pay immediate dividends. University of Massachusetts head coach Pam Hixon discovered such a treasure in Kyle Rothenberger.

"It is difficult for a freshman to come in, start and be an immediate contributor," said Hixon. "Kyle has stepped right up and played very well like she was an experienced player. She does everything well."

Rothenberger has been one of the top defenders for the Minutewomen this year, but the high point of her season came on offense. In the 2-0 upset of Old Dominion, Rothenberger converted a penalty corner for what turned out to be the game winning goal.

"I was very excited," said Rothenberger. "But I'm in an attack position and I'm expected to score. I was just in the right place at the right time."

Rothenberger, a Gilbertsville, Pa., native was a two-sport high school All-American in field hockey and lacrosse. She was heavily recruited, drawing interest from Old Dominion, Penn State, William & Mary, Princeton and New Hampshire.

"I fell in love with UMass on a recruiting trip," said Rothenberger. "I liked Pam as a coach and respected her knowledge of the game."

"I first had Kyle in a U.S. development camp when she was a sophomore in high school," said Hixon. "Last year she emerged as one of the top five recruits

Wolverines, Moeller choke again

One final point before we let the Florida St.— Miami match-up (Game of the Century XXV) slip away into the annals of videocassettedom: Was I the only one who noticed that the Seminoles got flagged for the same infraction three consecutive plays?

Must be hard not to have your offensive tackles line up in the backfield, eh Bobby?

BLINDSIDED — Sean Hayden on College Football

From the HOW THE MIGHTY HAVE FALLEN DEPT.: The Michigan Wolverines.

Big Blue's Gary Moeller was outcoached once again, this time by Michigan State's George Perles en route to the Spartans' 17-7 victory. Perles manages to keep his job, mainly because he's his own athletic director, by pulling out the big intrastate game once every three years. It's like clockwork, really.

Look for the Wolverines to drop to as low as No. 24 or 25 next week after a big loss this weekend to Penn State, who will now have to vie with the Ohio State Buckeyes for supremacy in the Big 10.

I must say, however, that with the Bobby Hoying-to-Joey Galloway routine and the outstanding defense they have in Columbus, head coach John Cooper and his squad smell like Roses, as in Pasadena.

Eric Zeier, are you serious? For those of you locked in a brain warp, the Georgia Bulldog QB, now a bona fide candidate for the Heisman, completed 30 of 47 passes for four touchdowns and a Southeastern Conference record 544 yards.

What's even more impressive is that he's doing this all by himself, without the aid of Andre Hastings and Garrison Hearst, both of whom split from Athens, Ga., for the green of the NFL.

To keep on the SEC kick, its game of the year takes place this weekend in Birmingham where the No. 2 Alabama Crimson Tide will host Tennessee and its superhuman QB, Heath Shuler.

'Bama has yet to be tested while the Volunteers have had the privilege of being whipped by the Florida Gators. The Vols will draw on that big game experience, with tailback Aaron Hayden (no relation) exploding to lead Tennessee to victory, 19-10.

California coach Keith Gilbertson might be joining former Golden Bear hoop coach Lou Campanelli on the unemployment line after Saturday's disgraceful debacle against Washington.

UMass astronomers receive Nobel Prize

By DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

The Nobel Prize for physics was awarded yesterday to two astronomers for their work while at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in the mid-1970s.

Joseph H. Taylor Jr., formerly an astronomy professor at the University, and Russell A. Hulse, who earned his doctorate in physics from UMass in 1975, discovered a binary pulsar that provided an opportunity for further study of gravity, according to the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences.

Taylor, 52, taught astronomy from 1968 to 1980. He and Hulse, 42, are both astronomy professors at Princeton University.

"The subject matter which was the beginning of the work that earned them the Nobel prize really was heavily associated with the thesis work of Russell Hulse," said Robert Hallock, chair of the UMass physics and astronomy department.

"They realized they had made a discovery, and realized the potential," he said.

Hallock, who worked with Taylor, said he had not contacted either Nobel recipient but that department professors had left messages for both and sent cards and letters of congratulations.

"We're delighted," he said. "It's very nice to have University of Massachusetts' graduate students' theses win the Nobel Prize, and it's very nice to see the Nobel Prize awarded to two really wonderful people."

According to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, the discovery by Taylor and Hulse helped confirm the existence of gravitational waves, predicted by Albert Einstein but never before confirmed.

Fred Byron Jr., dean of the UMass College of Arts and Sciences, told the Gazette that the research conducted by the two was a "milestone event" that people expect to win the Nobel Prize.

"It's a great day, a great day for Joe and Russ and a great day for the University," he said. "We're all extremely pleased. I'm so happy for Joe and Russ that it finally did happen."

"Well, I'm overwhelmed. My big problem is how to spend this day," Taylor told the Swedish news agency TT. "I would like it to be a normal day but I understand it can't be that way."

The Gazette reported that Hulse discovered the pulsar while scanning the skies from a radio observatory in Arecibo, Puerto Rico.

Pulsars are dense celestial bodies that pulsate radio waves at rapid, regular intervals. William Irvine, director of the Five-College Radio Astronomy Observatory at the Quabbin Reservoir, told the Gazette that this pulsar emitted irregular pulses due to a second pulsar whose orbit was near the first.

Taylor and Hulse's theory, he said, was that objects so close to each other and going around so fast might produce gravitational waves, as predicted by Einstein.

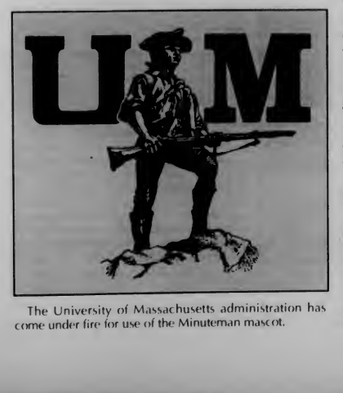
Campus rallies around mascot

Students speak out in support of the Minuteman logo

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff



An explosive wave of reaction heats the University of Massachusetts in response to a petition requesting the change of the "Minuteman" mascot.

The American Freedom Federation roused the response with its rally yesterday opposing the Minuteman as the University mascot because it believes the symbol is racist, sexist, and advocating oppression.

"It's ridiculous," Karin Furia, a senior communication major said. "People on this campus should stop being so anal."

Angry alumni are bombarding the Alumni Office with dissatisfaction over a possible mascot change, according to John Feudo, director of the Alumni Office.

"Many of the alumni that have called are outright angry," Feudo said. "People are screaming at my staff and students answering the phones."

The University of Massachusetts administration has come under fire for use of the Minuteman mascot.

The mascot issue hit the media nationwide with an Associate Press story and coverage in USA TODAY. Radio talk shows have called the University requesting comments and Channel 4 drove to the University to speak with the Vice Chancellor of University Relations and Development, Daniel Melley, and to field students' reactions.

Tradition is a big concern if the mascot were to be changed, according to George Parks, the director of the Minutemen Marching Band, because the University is identified through the Minutemen symbol.

"The University is trying to move ahead and build a tradition," Parks said. "Let's not tear it apart."

However, the Minuteman controversy sparked yesterday is not the first dispute the University has had over the mascot symbol.

In 1972, the mascot was changed from the "Redmen" to the "Minutemen" because a group of American Indians claimed the name as derogatory.

Melley was especially disturbed the petition received more coverage than two former University professor who won the Nobel Prize in physics for work they did while at the University.

"People should be concentrating on more important things," Michael Webb, a senior BDIC said. "There are homeless people in Amherst and they are worried about the mascot!"

Pat Potter, a 29-year employee at the University Bookstore is a Daughter of the American Revolution (DAR) with both Native American and Yankee descent. She said the mascot issue is "ridiculous."

"The Minutemen would be proud to be used as a mascot," she said. "They did not kill any Native Americans."

However, the Minuteman, while it is the school's mascot, is not what sells the University. According to Karin Sherbin, director of the News Office, the Minuteman is not a popular graphic and is not put on many items to be sold because people prefer other logos.

"I think it is ironic the outcry from the public," Sherbin said, "when it [the mascot] is not a graphic presentation of the University."

American G.I. remains held in Mogadishu

By MICHELLE PAUL
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — A U.S. presidential envoy made it plain Wednesday that Washington wouldn't bargain for captured U.S. pilot Michael Durant, as his Somali captors retreated to consider the demand that he be freed at once.

"We will not buy prisoners," said Robert Oakley, the former U.S. ambassador to this Horn of Africa nation.

Oakley met earlier with members of the Somali National Alliance, the clan-based political group holding Durant and a Nigerian peacekeeper.

The political group is loyal to warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid, whose arrest is sought by the United Nations for killing 24 Pakistani peacekeepers in ambushes last June. Aidid's people are blamed for killing at least 121 peacemakers.

The Somali National Alliance met to discuss Oakley's request for Durant's freedom and was expected to make a statement shortly, alliance sources said.

The Alliance was reported split over freeing Durant and the Nigerian or insisting the United Nations first free 32 Somali prisoners to secure the release of Durant or the Nigerian private captured earlier.

He added, "I believe the date release of both prisoners would indeed be a very positive sign... There are some optimistic indications out there." He would not elaborate.

The United States has recently sounded a more conciliatory tone toward Aidid, apparently in hopes of reaching a political settlement here.

Consultant diffuses stereotypes

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Jack Hasegawa is a consultant and trainer in the area of cultural diversity who plans to speak on "Diversity in the Workplace — Especially With Asian-Americans."

This topic comes from the stereotypes that go with the overall diversity in the offices and workrooms across America.

"Companies want to know more about Asian-Americans," Hasegawa said during a telephone interview. "The perception is that Asians and Asian-Americans are technical people. You have a lack of communication."

"Companies want to know more about Asian-Americans. The perception is that Asians and Asian-Americans are technical people. You have a lack of communication."
— Jack Hasegawa
General Secretary of Dwight Hall, Yale University

He said people are being blocked into their stereotypical jobs in the workplace. This does not let employees show their real skills. In turn, the workplace "is going to be in trouble if it keeps on stereotyping."

Hasegawa hopes that by talking to a college group, students who are entering the work force will be doing this with their eyes open.

"They will be able to make sure their performance isn't just on par, but noticeable also," he said.

If this country does not try to break stereotypes in the workplace, "America loses its greatest advantage — diversity," he said. Hasegawa pointed out that America is the most diverse country in the world.

Considered an authority on racism, Hasegawa has a jam-packed resume focusing in the area of cultural diversity and community work. A graduate of Harvard Divinity School with a Master of Theological Studies in the late 1960s, Hasegawa pursued his field work as a children's group worker and community organizer at the Cooper Community Center in Roxbury, Massachusetts.

He said there was a definite difference between Roxbury and the farm he grew up on near Fresno, California. Boston seemed like the biggest place he had ever been to, and at first it was very scary. But after a while, he saw that Roxbury was a "very neighborhood oriented place."

"It shaped my life in a positive way," said Hasegawa.

Fluent in spoken Japanese, Hasegawa was a community worker and English teacher at Yodogawa Zenkrikan, Osaka, Japan. He also was an instructor in management training for such Japanese corporations as Daihatsi Diesel, the Kyoto Branch of the Japan Industrial Bank and the Kyoto YMCA.

Hasegawa is a very busy person. He is both General Secretary of Dwight Hall at Yale University and a consultant for major world corporations and schools.

Just part of his duty as General Secretary is working with over 100 community service organizations and 2,000 student community service volunteers.

His consultations also reach topics concerning issues facing American organizations working with their Japanese counterparts.

"He's an icon for Asian-Americans," said Paul Gee, of the Asian-American Students Association (AASA).

Gee said one of the reasons that AASA pursued Hasegawa was because he is very outspoken, which, according to Gee, "breaks all the stereotypes of Asian-Americans."

"Hopefully the [AASA] members will identify with his topic, one that prepares students for the 'real world,'" said Gee.

Sponsored by the Office of Third World Affairs, the United Asia Cultural Center and the Asian American Students Association, Hasegawa's lecture is the second in the series this semester. Admission is free and all are welcome.

Lesbians fight back

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

There was a different type of parade held in Northampton on Columbus Day. Lesbians wearing superhero capes and banging on trash can lids painted to look like superhero shields marched through downtown to eat fire at City Hall.

This National Coming Out Day visibility action was the creation of the Lesbian Avengers, a New York based direct action group focused on issues of lesbian visibility and survival.

Outraged by a proposed anti-gay initiative in Lewiston, Maine, The Lesbian Avengers embarked on a bus ride through the Northeast. Their goal is to make people aware of attempts by the Christian Right to enact unconstitutional anti-gay legislation in cities and states around the country.

About 100 women gathered at the corner of Gothic and Main Streets for the short parade to City Hall. On City Hall steps women from the Avengers and the local community gathered in celebration of National Coming Out Day. Several people spoke about the importance of organizing against the grass roots activity of Christian extremists and emphasized the need for national lesbian and gay civil rights legislation.

"We came to Northampton because of its large lesbian community. We wanted to provide the initial energy to organize," said Lesbian Avenger Juliayn Coleman.

Local lesbians, disappointed by the lack of political action in the Northampton area, welcomed the Lesbian Avengers.

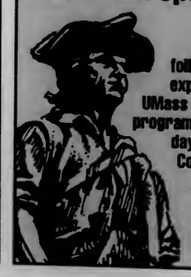
"The fact that Northampton is a safe place for us is no excuse for the sense of complacency here," said UMass student Lisa A. Catalanotti. "That nobody feels threatened in Northampton makes it a great environment for political action. If you aren't part of the solution then you must be part of the problem."

The Lesbian Avengers closed the action with what has become a signature for the group: fire eating.

"We began to eat fire in response to the torching of an Oregon home during the campaign of Measure 9, an anti-gay initiative similiar to the one coming up in Lewiston," said Lesbian Avenger Melanie Fallon. "A lesbian and gay man were killed. Fire is so often used as a weapon against us. We wanted to reclaim it.

"The fire will not consume us. We'll take it and make it our own," Fallon said. She encouraged the crowd to chant as fifteen women ate fire.

Following the action, the Avengers held a forum at the Haymarket Cafe to discuss hate tatics employed by the Christian Right. A video produced and distributed by the Christian Right was shown.



The Avengers expressed concern at what they say is a campaign developed by the Right pitting African-American heterosexuals against the lesbian gay and bisexual community.

"This video wrongly asserts that lesbians, gay, and bisexual people are taking hard won civil rights away from other minorities by claiming 'special rights,'" said Anne Stott. "This denies the existence of gay people of color.

"These attempts to divide and conquer feed on the basic ideas that have long sustained the Right: racism, sexism, homophobia, and anti-Semitism. We denounce this hate agenda," said Stott.

"It is important to take the power we gained here today and overflow it into other communities," said Northampton resident Susan Keyes. "We must make all lesbian struggles our own."

Marquette Multiculturalists?

In what may be a trend sweeping college campuses, on Monday Marquette University agreed to change its mascot and logo from the "Warriors" to something less offensive to Native Americans. It has not been determined what the new nickname and logo will be.

The Warrior has been the mascot at the Milwaukee school since 1954 and the logo consisted of a picture of a Native American in full headdress.

"The decision is indicative of Marquette's long standing respect for Native Americans," said Marquette Athletic Director Bill Cords in a phone interview.

Cords said the university had been looking into the situation for the past 18 months and this decision was not based on "caving in" to a protest.

"We did this under no pressure from anyone," Cords said. "There have been no campaigns, no phone calls, and no protests. We just felt this was the best thing for Marquette."

A caller to the "News from other U's" hotline yesterday, referring to himself as a Marquette alumnus, disagreed with Cords.

"Three students protested last year and now the school is caving in," the caller said. "They changed it without any open forums or anything. You guys at UMass should watch out, your school will do it, too, and for no good reason."

Cords admits that the perception is that the school backed down to politically correct groups and, while most alumni are opposed to the change and have been voicing their opinion in numbers, the university will go forward with the new logo.

"People think we caved in, but we're trying to let them know that isn't the case," Cords said. "We definitely have received mixed reviews from students and alumni. Most people are not favorable of the change."

One reason Marquette began to look into a possible name change, according to Cords, was the action of the University of Wisconsin. Last spring, the Badgers played the Alcorn State Scalping Braves in basketball and the campus was outraged.

Wisconsin is one of the few colleges in the country which is considered more politically fragmented than UMass. The outrage was so great, the school said it would no longer play against colleges with offensive nicknames.

"It was just a policy, they said they would still play us, but we took that seriously," Cords said.

The new mascot will be chosen from a panel consisting of students, faculty, and staff. According to the caller one of the names considered was the Minuteman, the under fire mascot of the University of Massachusetts. He said it had been deemed "inoffensive and a source of pride in America's heritage."

Cords did not know whether the Minuteman was a possible replacement for the Warrior but he was surprised to learn it was potentially offensive.

"The Minuteman is offensive? Why?" Cords asked.

When explained that a few students at UMass had said the Minuteman was a violent, racist, and sexist symbol (a white man with a gun) Cords said:

"Boy, and in Massachusetts at that," he said. "Well, each institution has to look at its own situation. But we'll keep that in mind."

Marquette, like Massachusetts, has a high profile basketball program which generates hundreds of thousands of dollars for the university. Cords said the name change has not adversely affected the marketing of the team or the sale of Warrior paraphernalia.

"Actually it has helped our sales," Cords said. "Alumni are buying up the last of the Warrior stuff. I think the nickname doesn't matter, it is whether you are successful. If you're winning you will sell, no matter the logo."

LBGA rallies for commitment

National Coming Out Day held at Student Union

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Matt Malone of the LBGA gives an address at Wednesday's rally as Chancellor David Scott and others look on.

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

About 125 people braved the cold weather Wednesday to celebrate National Coming Out Day with a noon rally on the Studet Union steps.

National Coming Out Day was established in 1987 as a day set aside every year to be spent encouraging lesbians, gay men and bisexual people to come out of the closet and be honest with people about their sexual orientation.

Wendy Mataya, a graduate student employee of the Program for GLB Concerns described it as, "...a day for queers to come together and celebrate with pride our culture and history."

Chancellor David K. Scott said Coming Out Day was signicant to not just the GLB community but to the University as a whole. He confided in the crowd that he felt UMass had fallen behind in addressing GLB issues.

Quoting the poet Maya Angelou, Scott said, "We have lain too long in this bruising darkness."

Scott said he considers GLB issues to be an important aspect of the UMass commitment to multiculturalism. Scott said he believes people should be able to "live our lives in true loving relationships that won't be harassed or threatened."

The chancellor ended his speech by remarking that a barrier against any one group is a barrier against all groups. "To remove barriers against lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals would be removing barriers for all," he said.

Dvora Zipkin described herself to the crowd as a "White, Jewish, lesbian-identified bisexual, graduate student concentrating on social justice." Zipkin said of all those labels, "Why should being queer be so invisible. The healthiest thing we can do is come out, to stop keeping a part of ourselves a secret."

Ali Davis felt a little somber at the lack of ALANA members at the rally. "We must help ALANA people feel more comfortable about coming out. The GLB community must open it's eyes and arms to people of color so I can see more Black brothers and sisters in this crowd and feel proud of who I am," Davis said.

Coming Out Day is an affirmation of self pride and recognition of self esteem. It takes courage and patience and sometimes involves a lot of heartache but, believe me, I am so much happier now then when i was alone in the closet." said LBGA member Kelly Hayes.

SGA gets funding for diversity

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association will receive $60,000 in additional funding for the promotion of multiculturism and diversity, SGA President David Nunez said at the SGA meeting last night.

Nunez said the money will be given to any two Registered Student Organizations who agree to work together on an issue of color.

"If the Ski Club wants to get together with the Outing Club because they feel that they need more people of color in their organizations and they want to work on that, they will be eligible to receive some of the money," Nunez said.

The extra money for RSOs has come as a result of the Mission Enhancement Fund, an idea that began with UMass President Michael K. Hooker. The fund consists of $4.5 million which is available to all five UMass campuses. The SGA had originally petitioned for $120,000 and was granted half, Nunez said.

Nunez said he will chair a committee that will determine which RSOs will receive money out of the fund.

"I am chairman of the committee which will decide if an RSO will receive money or not," he said. "Anyone can apply to be a member of the committee, but the committee must have a Native American, an African American, an Asian American, an LBGA member and a member of the Third World Caucus. The committee must also be half women.

Graduate panel discusses Clinton, Columbus

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

What do Bill Clinton and Christopher Columbus have in common? According to the student forum that took place last night at the Cape Cod Lounge, more than you think. The event named "The Meanings of 1492: Contemporary Intersections," featured a panel of graduate students.

The first speaker of the night, Julia Mahoney, expressed concern on what she called "appreciation versus appropriation:" how people in this country have exploited elements of Native American culture to their own advantage. She mentioned U.S. government documents and "New Age entrepreneurs" as examples of this practice.

The next two panelists, Charles Lenchner and Prasad Venugopal, criticized the United States and Israel for their "terrorist" behavior in the Middle East.

Lenchner, an Israeli, compared the establishment of the state of Israel to the colonization of the Americas after Columbus. Prasad draw the public's attention to what he called the crimes committed by the United States in Iraq.

The most interesting presentation of the night drew upon the commonalities shared by Columbus and some of his descendants. Hussein Ibish criticized the new world order as a failure.

"The rhetoric is not matched by the power, the power is not complemented by the will, there's no ability to do this," he said.

He illustrated this point with the current world issues such as the crisis in the Balkans, the war in Angola and the situation in South Africa. He then called Clinton "a descendant of Columbus... a failed Columbus," in his latest attempt to send troops to Haiti, the same island where Columbus first arrived.

The last panelist, Madanmohan Rao, based his presentation on the assumption that the American way of life was a product of Imperialism. He said that the American people received the fruits of the U.S. foreign policy while millions in the developing world struggle to survive.

An open discussion followed with the participation of students and teachers. Special attention was given to the role of American universities in shaping U.S. foreign policy as well as providing education for foreign elites.

The panelists called for the end of U.S. intervention in developing countries and insisted that the public should write the President asking him to withdraw the troops. As the discussion continued, more and more examples were given to illustrate the relationship between Columbus and his "descendants."

EWC sets the record straight

I am writing to clarify factual errors in Shyamala Ivatury's article [Collegian Oct 7]. I am concerned that the repeated presentation of erroneous information could deter from accessing critical services.

I must begin by saying that I am confused by Ms. Ivatury's article. Ms. Ivatury presented this same erroneous information to the Graduate Student Senate on Tuesday, October 5, as well as a motion calling for a "review of EWC to assess its performance." EWC staff were present and corrected the misinformation. As a result, the motion was tabled by the GSS and GSS officers agreed to meet with EWC staff to discuss concerns. Why then is Ms. Ivatury proceeding as if this meeting never happened?

ECW has made repeated overtures to GSS officers, inviting participation on our advisory board and search committees, and inviting officers to a staff meeting. Unfortunately, it appears that there is little interest in dialogue. However, we continue to encourage GSS and any and all individuals to meet and work with us.

As an organization that is responsive to the changing needs of women, we are constantly engaged in the process of evaluating and rethinking our programs, services and organizational structure. Recently we hired consultants to assist us in our ongoing process of becoming a more multi-cultural organization.

We looked at every aspect of EWC — from organizational structure and decision making to provision of culturally and linguistically appropriate services to all the diverse populations of Hampshire County. We remain committed to multi-culturalism, willing to grapple with difficult issues, and are able to respond to changing needs.

Ms. Ivatury suggests concrete actions that EWC should take, including, "diversification of staff, implementation of programs for women of color... and... the availability of multilingual counseling." EWC is diverse. Forty percent of professional staff and over 50 percent of the paid student staff are women of color. Forty percent of our professional staff are bilingual or multilingual.

We are also diverse in terms of class, religion, sexual orientation, etc. We were recently able to restore the Women of Color program (which had been eliminated by the administration) and offer culturally and linguistically appropriate services through all of our programs. Finally, counseling services are currently available in Chinese, English and Spanish.

EWC provides services to 15,000 women each year. We raise about one-third of our overall funding ourselves and receive no funding support from GSS. Our request for FY 94 funding was denied by them. We encourage you to come and check us out and to give us your input based on the facts. We also want to thank the many students, faculty and staff who have expressed their support.

Is it the land of the 'free'?

In the land of the free and the home of the brave not all men are created equal. All men are created equal if they have European heritage, speak English, are white and, of course, are men. This is the land in which the life of a Cuban is worth more than the life of a Chinese, a Haitian, or a Dominican for immigration policies.

Evelyn A.
DE JESUS

At least two pilot organizations in Miami fly three to four times a week between Key West and Cuban waters to rescue any Cuban defecting by boat.

Pilots from Hermanos al Rescate or Brothers to the Rescue fly and inform the Coast Guard about the position of the "balseros" (rafters) so they can be rescued.

Once the rafters get to the United States, they are interviewed by Internal Naturalization Service officials to grant them political asylum. Their names also change. Now they are called "refugees," because they have escaped from a system of repression and are looking for the freedom of a democracy.

The refugees are then taken to a philanthropic organization such as the Catholic Conference of America in Miami or the Cuban Transit Shelter in Key West where they are fed and given clothing, shoes, and a medical examination. The organizations also try to help them find relatives in the U.S.

Things are different for a Dominican, a Haitian, or a Chinese in terms of immigrating to "America." Cubans have the blessing of U.S. legislation which protects every person who flees from a communist regime. It is not new to have people leaving their countries in a raft or anything that floats to reach the U.S. This has occurred more often because those immigrants are now "coming to America."

Students in political science classes love to argue about whether or not to allow Haitians into the U.S.: Is it racism? The mainland's argument is: what can I get out of you before you get here?

One of the common duties of the U.S. Coast Guard in Puerto Rican stations is to pick up Dominicans who try to get to the island. When discovered, they are deported. If they are lucky, they can stay and work for a living. They usually send money to their relatives back home in the Dominican Republic.

I grew up witnessing the sacrifices those Dominican men and women make to earn a living, have a home, gain basic access to health care, etc. They contributed to the Puerto Rican society as everybody else did.

I grew up around Cubans, who also live on the island. I have seen many of them work hard and achieve their goals outside their native land, their beloved Cuba to which they cannot go back. It is natural for me to see immigrants develop themselves in this system, which I refuse to justify as a difference in immigration policies, according to the political system where they come from.

Mexican officials do not understand why the Cuban exile community in Miami pressured them to invite back the Cuban rafters they deported to Cuba last August. Meanwhile, the U.S. made them deport a ship full of Chinese that wrecked in the Pacific Mexican coast the month before.

"They [U.S. officials] made us deport the Chinese. Why not the Cubans?" a Mexican official told The Miami Herald.

Wanted: An inclusive mascot

I thank the victimologists for reminding me that I too, as an Irish-American, am the victim of that Limey bastard, the Minuteman.

How could I have been so long deceived into believing that he symbolized independent, hardworking yeomen and entrepreneurs fighting to defend their families and a fledgling democracy from the hand of empire?

These were merely the same imperialists that crushed my people fighting among themselves for the opportunity to lay waste to the noble savages of the New World. And sexist? Well, simply by virtue of the fact that he lived during the 99.9 percent of human history whose every achievement is now blackened by the presence of that institution of women's enslavement, the sexual division of labor.

Now that this repressed memory of victimization has been awakened I will have to insist that the multiracial, hermaphroditic hero that replaces him will have some Irish heritage, or you can bet your whiskey to doughnuts that I will be waving my shillelagh outside the door of our new Chancellor, whose heritage I will be able to forgive, after I finish therapy.

But wait! Now I hear the weeping souls of my French-Canadian ancestors, butchered in the forests of New England by these low-rent Brits and then forced to watch Dallas (in English!) instead of authentic Canadian programming.

You think this is mean-spirited? We all have blood on our hands. Mean-spirited is trying to find meaning and purpose in always looking for the blood on the hands of the good, the great, or the merely human, simply because it is associated with success. Happy Columbus Day.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

JOKE OF THE DAY: What sports arena will collapse under 70 mile per hour winds and can't withstand an earthquake? You got it — the Mullins Center.

Now why in the hell didn't they just build a sports arena that can take a mild wind and a little bit of natural shaking? Fine, the probability of an earthquake is mighty low, but it can still happen. Who is to doubt the likelihood of miracles — not me.

But then again if Metallica didn't bring down the Mullins Center I suppose it is stable enough for now.

Ladies and gentlemen, please put your seats in an upright position and relax as we take a scenic tour of the UMass campus. As you enjoy the view of unmatched architecture, take a closer look at the pathetic level of deterioration of the buildings. If it troubles you that the main library on campus is surrounded by scattered bricks, do not fret because no one actually goes there to study; rather, to socialize and eat junk food.

This is where I interject and let all of you freshpeople know that I did see you trying to enter the library through those inside gates that enclose the library and cage in all of those vicious meat-eating bricks. Thanks for the hearty laugh! Obviously you didn't attend a campus tour during orientation?

Never, I repeat never try to enter the library through the inside gates! Those of you who have performed this daring stunt were extremely lucky that a brick didn't fall on your head.

Stacy
MALONE

So please refrain from getting too close to the library, because if a brick falls on your head Health Services may deduce that you are pregnant and give you a flu vaccine. Health Services has proven that men can get pregnant too so watch out!

The other day some guy from WMUA asked me to comment on the smoking ban. Comment. What do you think of that, buddy?

Picture this. There I am, an innocent bystander of course, he runs up to me and shoves a microphone in my face. Then he has the nerve to ask me what I think about the smoking ban.

What, did I have a sign on me that said "Hi there, buddy why don't 'cha come and see if your microphone can fit up my left nostril!" No, I don't think I did.

So, about that smoking ban — I think reporters shoving microphones in innocent people's faces should be banned, but we should all smoke. Pot that is.

Speaking of mind-altering drugs... I think that guy who was fasting for Columbus Day is on something. I just want him to know that I was the one who walked by him really, really slowly with donuts, candy bars, and cookies. And those crumbs were strategically dropped.

Personally I respect him for being so dedicated to a good cause. I don't think Columbus Day is a holiday and it should not be celebrated (although I could use an extra day off every once in a while), but dude, food is just so good. How can you do that? There must have been another form of protest for you than depriving yourself of wonderful nutrients.

As an obsessive compulsive, I respect you for straying from the norm — the four food groups.

I saw that the Minuteman came out — JEERS. Now I have something to use for my cat's litter box. Those dopes should write for a real newspaper, like the Graduate Voice.

A scary childhood trip back through the eighties

During last semester, I was outside with my friends playing football in the snow when a memory popped into my mind. For some reason, I thought about when I was in junior high and a bunch of my friends and I went sledding.

I remember being jealous of them. Why? Because they all had a pair of moonboots, and I didn't. Moonboots. I was devastated over the fact that I did not have those HIDEOUS and DESPICABLE looking moonboots.

When I look back on different instances in my life, there are the styles, fashions and other popular items of the time that I now look back on and laugh, like my desire for those boots.

Here are just some of the many things I can recall from growing up in the '80s. I hope you can all relate.

The bowl cut — This kind of haircut swept the nation, and unfortunately, most of us got caught up in it. Boys, girls; it did not matter. Everyone, at one time or another, had one during grade school.

Recess — Remember the red ball we played dodge and kickball with? Indoor recess was a bummer, man, unless of course you played 7-UP. Now there is a harmless game for pre-adolescent children. Harmless, of course, unless some punk peeked to see who touched him.

First dose of colored underwear — Who did not have a pair of Underoos? The blue and yellow Batman ones, the Supermans. For the girls, Wonder Woman. Easily the most interesting underwear I have ever had.

Cabbage Patch craze — Pandemonium broke loose in toy stores all over the country the day the Cabbage Patch Dolls came out. My mom went to buy one for my sister on the first day it was sold and got decked by some lunatic trying to grab one. She held on to "Penelope Irene", and, needless to say, my sister was very pleased.

Andrew
BRYCE

Sticker Albums — I had every kind of sticker in my album. Scratch and sniff? Many. Fuzzy ones? Had 'em. Bumper stickers? They took up whole pages, but I still had them. I still have the sticker album to this day. For what reason I have no idea.

Halloween — That special day each year where we use to get psyched for getting Reese's Peanut Butter Cups, and disappointed when someone gave us an apple. Apples? On Halloween? And never eat the candy until someone at home checked it. That sicko in your neighborhood might have put razors in your Reese's.

THE Jacket — Michael Jackson came out with the song "Beat It", and millions craved the jacket he wore. You remember, the red leather number covered with zippers. To this day I have not forgiven my parents for not buying me one.

Burger Heroes — Clara Peller, the now-deceased star of those old Wendy's commercials, said just three words and became an instant celebrity for saying, "Where's the beef?" How about Herb, the "elusive burger man" who, if you sighted and had proof of it, you could get a free cheeseburger at Burger King?

Davy and Goliath — On Sunday mornings I used to hurry down to watch this religious cartoon. Hey, Davy sure was lucky having Goliath, the talking dog, giving him advice. Amen to that.

The first day of school — School shopping was the best. Searching for the COOLEST lunch box. Scoping out the different color Trapper Keepers. Hunting for the corduroys (oops, they are back in style). That first day had at least one picture-happy parent taking photos of the kids in their first-day-of-school attire at the bus stop.

I can only imagine what we will be hacking on ten years from now. But it cannot be half as bad as seeing myself years ago wearing a jean jacket covered with pins, listening to Quiet Riot's "Cum On Feel Tha Noize" while playing Pac Man on Atari, waiting for The Dukes of Hazzard to come on.

At least I hope not.

Now that I've grown up

Well, here we are at deadline time, and I can't think of a single thing to write about. This, of course, is not good. Why don't I have a topic? What happened? I mean, I used to have plenty of topics and now there's just this strange void between my ears. Hmmm.

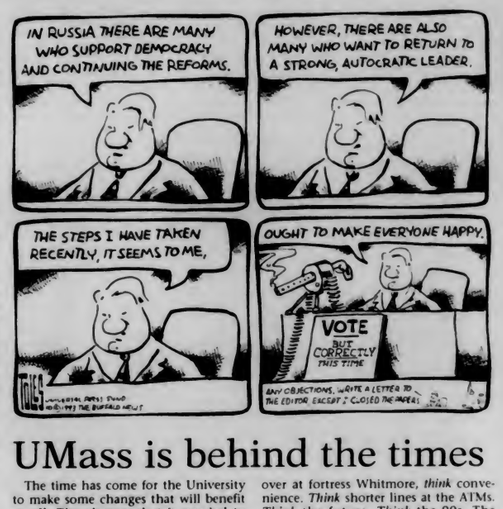
Come to think of it, I really haven't had much to say at all lately. When did this happen, I wonder. What do I think about now, anyway? Sadly enough, not all that much. What do I talk about? Lately, again, not all that much. I think about women or this or that petty little problem I have. My friends and I talk about our collective petty problems, and about drugs. Great. My God, how pathetic.

I very definitely used to think about lots of other things, I remember it clearly. Long nights, talking about whether or not there really is, or even could be, a god. About human nature (do people inherently suck, or is it just that most people are raised to be idiots, just sort of accidentally?), politics (ya think the right actually believes, deep down inside, that the junk they spew really will benefit everyone, or do they know as well as we do that the only people who stand to gain from their policies are themselves? They really could be that stupid, you know), whatever. I mean, I've always cared about the (few, petty) things I now waste my mental energy on, but there used to be more.

In fact, come to think of it, I used to care maybe just a little bit too much. Everything got to me. Every single little injustice I saw or even heard about, any example of humanity's vast stupidity, hypocrisy or selfishness, would be almost guaranteed to send me into at least a minor state of annoyance or agitation, if not an actual fit. I was Holden Caulfield, angry young man extrordinaire. I hated a large part of the world around me.

So I wanted, naturally enough, to change it. I thought I could, too, at least to make a dent. I stopped eating meat, because I thought it was unnecessary, wasteful of resources, and inherently cruel. I boycotted various products (or at least refused to actually pay for them) if I opposed their corporate policies.

I gave to Greenpeace and supported Amnesty International. For a while, I actually even believed in pacifism as a rational, practical way of dealing with people (you know, prove to someone that you won't stoop to their level and sooner or later, people will learn by your example). Hell, I went all out and protested that war we had a few years back (incidentally, who even remembers that, or Panama, anymore?). As I said, I wanted to change the world.



I remember being told time and time again that "It's not your job," or, "Let other people deal with their own problems, you can't be responsible for anyone but yourself."

You know what? I finally listened.

Now all I care about is me and the petty little problems of day to day life. Maybe part of the reason I think about the things I do is to keep my mind off what I used to care about. It's kind of like, "Hey, the world is a mess and I know it, but I'm having problems with my girlfriend and anyway, I need to study so I can get a good job." After all, I'm not 16 anymore, it's time I started being more responsible.

I'm so glad I've finally grown up.

Violence creates a menace

In my two-plus years at the University of Massachusetts, I have read a lot of unintelligible comments on the editorial page of the Collegian. But on Friday, October 8, the worst to date was written by A.J. Stewart.

It's bad enough that he has enough free time to voice his opinion about meaningless subjects such as people who need a slap.

But I find it even worse that the Collegian printed this atrocity. They should have known what they were dealing with when they read such quotes as "the beauty of a body snapping in two, blood showering crowds, and the splattering of organs across the crowd."

I have always found the Collegian to be a forum receptive to any opinion, which is permissible, but Stewart's "opinions" are frightening vehicles of insecurity, the worst of which is his notion that "the country's best minds" ought to scrap health care reform for "maintaining a set of standards for violent activity." One wonders whom these minds belong to, David Duke?

Mr. Stewart, is the real cause of your strife the drunken fool who spilt beer on your sweater? If I took a swing for all the suds dumped on my new clothing I'd be a heavyweight champion. And exactly what are the "therapeutic benefits of punching someone's lights out?" If you know them so well then you are a real menace.

What's worse, Stewart is genuinely fascinated by brutality. Few over the age of five find the Care Bears interesting, but what good could come from the all-violence network that Stewart proposes?

I'm certain that he, like most others, knows that television violence has been cited repeatedly for motivating many of the "terribly vicious acts" that even he seems to avoid.

In sum, I don't think Stewart is in a position to decide which of his own "valid aggressive feelings" he can violently relieve. If he were, there would be a lot of injured "lunch ladies" (just a touch of sexism, perfect for such a chillingly deranged fiend).

UMass is behind the times

The time has come for the University to make some changes that will benefit us all. The change that is needed to make our lives easier to conduct on a daily basis at this University is called "Vali-Dine."

The Vali-Dine system works to accommodate everyone from students to faculty. The system is comprised of a new student identification card with a magnetic strip on the backside of the card. Vending machines, campus restaurants and dining commons would all be equipped with a slot to run your card through.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

The system could even be extended to the laundry facilities, thus relieving the need for quarters. After each use, the amount spent is deducted from your Vali-Dine account and your remaining balance would be displayed on the computer's screen.

Each semester you or your family, depending on who foots the Vali-Dine bill, deposits money into your account to be used. The Vali-Dine system is a convenient way to purchase things on campus without actually having to carry money in your pockets. In addition, the Vali-Dine system could alleviate long lines at the campus ATM machines in the Campus Center.

Universities across the nation have installed Vali-Dine systems. Indiana University has the Hoosier Express Card and Union College has recently instituted the Vali-Dine system. As of yet, both are a great success and should be looked at as a precedent for UMass to follow. This system is to benefit the University and the members of the campus Community.

Now, listen up all you passive folk over at fortress Whitmore, think convenience. Think shorter lines at the ATMs. Think the future. Think the 90s. The University is here to serve the students and our needs. Unfortunately, the students needs are being ignored.

The University is supposed to prepare us for the future, but how can we get prepared for the future if our own administration is stuck living in the past. Out of date facilities and inconvenient ways of doing business spells UMass.

Examine this campus. Buildings and lecture halls are falling apart where the desks are inscribed with, "Sally was here 1961." The campus walkways are nothing but mud in the spring and winter. Students, especially those that hail far from the Massachusetts state boundaries, pay a hefty sum to attend school here. Isn't it time that our money went into improving the campus community. Therefore, it is a must and a necessity that the Vali-Dine system, or one comparable to it, be considered by the administration for the Amherst campus.

Vali-Dine would save students money for the meals they didn't attend. Hence, meals not eaten wouldn't be deducted from a students meal balance on their account. Moreover, the Vali-Dine system has proven to work elsewhere. The time for the University to consider and eventually expedite the process of a Vali-Dine system on campus has come.

The administration needs to research this issue and get the ball rolling. The Vali-Dine system will get this University out of the past and take us into the future. If Whitmore acts fast the University of Massachusetts will no longer be the laughingstock of the state. Rather, the University will be looked upon as a leader in bettering the campus community for the good of the students.

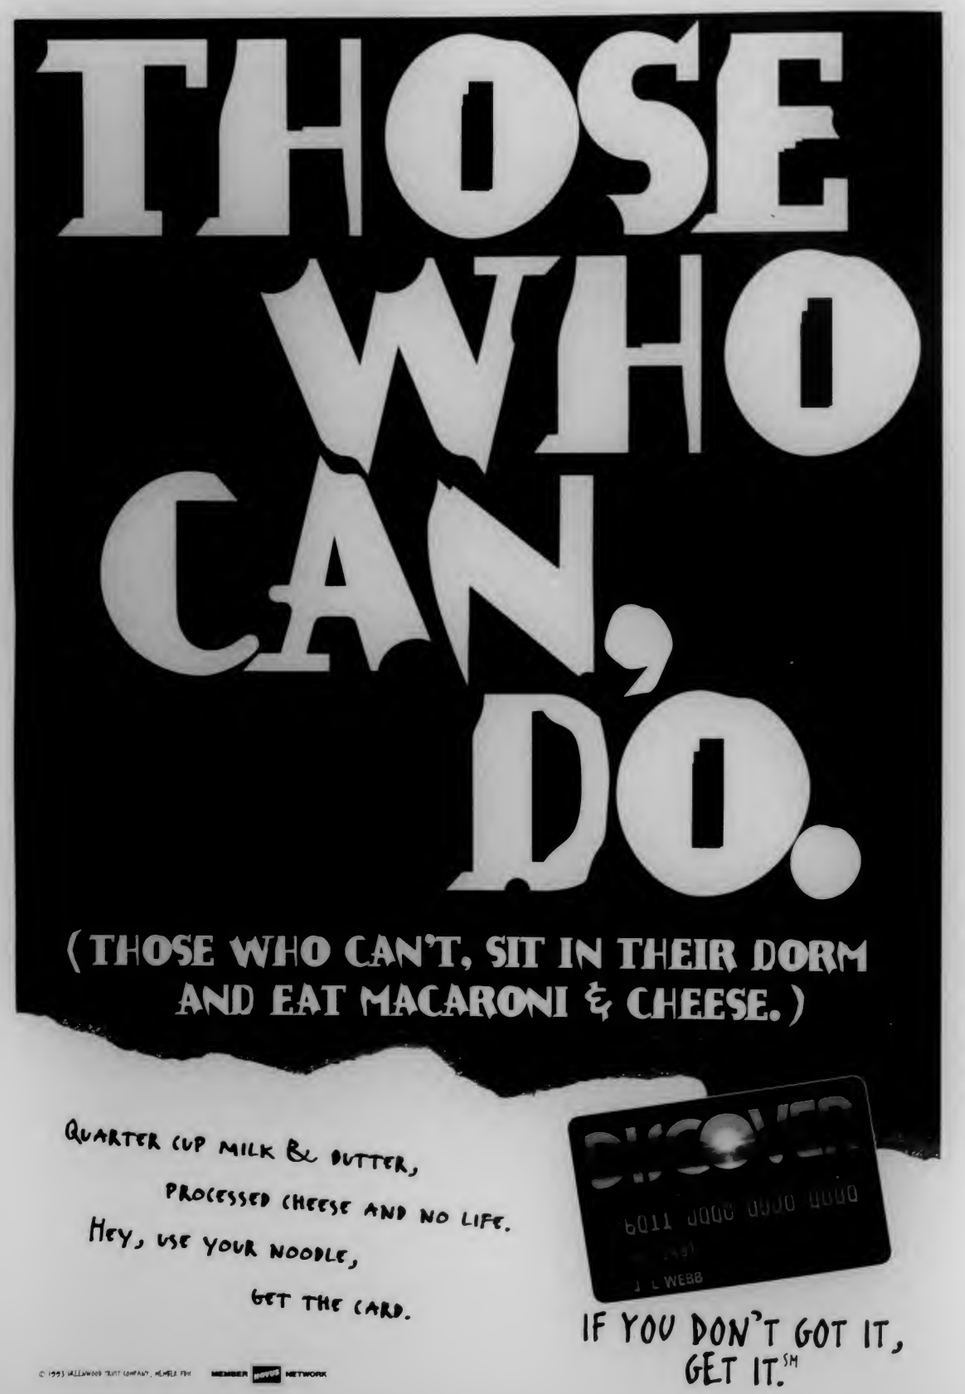
homophobia and anti-Semetism," Nunez said.



Student Government Speaker Matt Pavesi, a senior, said he is committed to helping to establish a polling place in the Sowthwest residential area.

"Before I graduate, there will be a polling place in Southwest for town elections," Pavesi said. "Southwest is in precincts four and 10, which is 90 percent student residents. Right now students have to go to the Bangs Community Center to vote. It has been proven that the Hampden Dining Commons [in Southwest] has enough parking and is handicapped accessible, and it has been proven that when a polling place is close by, more people vote."

Pavesi also vowed to fight the keg licensing law, which prevents the purchase of kegs without a license.

"Some students try to get around the law by going to Hadley to buy a keg," he said. "But the police have undercover police officers inside stores like Liquors 44 and they radio to Amherst police sitting on the town border that you have a keg in your car. The police then follow you to your home and watch you take the keg out of your car. Can you say, 'Big Brother?'"

The SGA will also fight the town bylaw that prevents more than four unrelated people from living in one house together and the law that permits police to arrest tenants of houses that are deemed too loud, Pavesi said.

Native American issues discussed

By VANESSA AMIN
Collegian Correspondent

Joyce White Deer Vincent, the program coordinator for The Josephine White Center, spoke at an open forum to address issues concerning Native Americans and how to contribute and utilize the center.

The Human Relations Department held an open forum Wednesday titled "Utilizing The Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center as a Resource for Change" in the Campus Center at noon.

According to Vincent, the center is not just for Native Americans but for all students who would like to interact and respect each other culturally. The center is a place for students to feel comfortable and to be themselves, Vincent said. Also, the center offers various programs such as dancing, arts and crafts, said Vincent.

"The center is not here to isolate or separate other cultures from us (Native Americans)," Vincent said, "it's here for support and acknowledgment."

The cultural center has its own resource library with approximately 50 books, Vincent said. With some support and materials, Vincent said, the library will be able to progress and students will soon be able to take home books.

The programs are geared for the students who tought for this center, Vincent said. Various organizations as well as students may call the center if they would like a Native American to speak at a given function, said Vincent.

"We would be happy to accommodate anyone but please give enough notice ahead of time," Vincent said.

According to Vincent, most Native American students would like to know and understand more about their history and heritage, however, the curriculum tends to give misinformation about Native American history.

"Let's get the textbooks right, said Vincent. "We need to end this problem of false information."

Referring to an opinion column printed in the Collegian on Oct. 5, 1993 titled "Minority Programs Amount to State Sponsored Segregation," Vincent said that the column gave the impression that all the Native Americans can get what they want if they ask for it.

"It has taken us years to get where we are and we're still a drop in the bucket," said Vincent.

"We do not discriminate, Vincent said. If you respect us as human beings then you will get the same respect back."

According to Vincent, the editorial also said that the Native Americans are minorities, which is not true.

"After reading the article, I first felt angry then sad. If we educate our students then maybe ignorance will slowly disappear," said Heyda Martinez, the coordinator for counseling in the Women's Center.

The Josephine White Eagle Center is located in the basement of Chadbourne Residence Hall which includes four rooms.

■ Somalia

A guerrilla war with Aidid's forces has kept about half the U.N. force bottled up in southern Mogadishu. The rest of Somalia is generally quiet and is recovering from the civil war and famine that killed an estimated 350,000 Somalis last year.

As ambassador, Oakley left in 1991 when the overthrow of dictator Mohamed Siad Darre deteriorated into clan warfare and anarchy. Mass starvation resulted, prompting creation of a multinational peacekeeping operation, now under the United Nations, to deliver food to the starving and restore order.

U.N. efforts to capture Aidid, with the resultant civilian and troop casualties, set off a backlash in the United States and elsewhere against the mission.

NU midfielder Shawn Diaz who was in close after a UMass turnover.

With 22:10 left in the first half, Minuteman Justin Edelman was taken down in the penalty box, but no call was made. Moments later Kevin Martin's shot was tipped wide by NU goalie Randy Spencer who then made a nice stop on Mike Doyle on the ensuing corner kick.

After that flurry, the defenses took over until 41:40 when UMass's Todd Kylish was able to head a Doyle corner kick by Spencer, but Huskies defender Todd Jordan was able to clear the goal. Jordan and Heiko Ross were strong on the backline for NU in the opening half.

The Minutemen came out aggressively in the second half. Defender Chris Merril made several runs in the offensive zone. At 52:44 Jacobs sent a nice lob over the NU defense, but Minuteman defensemen Dan Chagnon was barely offside before slamming it in the net.

At 70:46 Jacobs picked up a loose ball on the right side and was able to beat Jordan and go in uncontested. Doyle raced up the middle of the box, drawing Spencer's attention. Jacobs deposited his eighth goal of the season by the right goalpost.

"I went to his short side, floating almost a changeup by him, because he looked at Doyle," said Jacobs.

Northeastern couldn't muster up a scoring threat in the final twenty minutes, and Donnenwirth credits the whole team for the outstanding defensive play.

"The whole team came back and marked well, we've played well defensively the last two games."

The team must focus on St. Bonaventure this weekend, and a win is imperative to keep its Atlantic 10 tournament hopes alive. Jacobs said his spirit is still high.

"We can't worry about the past, only focus on the next couple of games," said Jacobs. "Anything can happen. We can still make the tournament."

Hamlin fire causes evacuation

ARAM COMBEAN / COLLEGIAN

One of the victims of Wednesday morning's fire in Hamlin Hall was this lounge couch, which authorities say caught fire accidentally.

An early morning fire in Hamlin Residence Hall forced students out of bed and out of their building for an hour.

Officers from the Department of Fire and Safety and Environmental Health Services, the University of Massachusetts Police and the Amherst Fire Department responded the to 3:10 a.m. alarm.

The fire, caused by a match or cigarette dropped into a couch cushion, is estimated to have caused $3,500 in damage to furniture, lighting fixtures and wiring in the basement smoking room, according to fire prevention officer Michael Swain.

The fire was contained to the lounge.

Diane Anderson, residential director of the Hamlin, Leach and Dwight cluster, said approximately 140 students were evacuated. Due to cold, wet weather, students stayed in Leach until they were allowed back to their rooms.

The basement lounge is open 24 hours to smoking residents. "It looks bad," Anderson said. "The walls are all black."

Swain said the fire was ruled accidental. Anderson said students are being interviewed to determine if any further action will be taken.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Money troubles could wear you down. Watch careless spending. Prospects for the future, however, look bright. Present the best image to future employers.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You might possibly meet your mate for life today, so look sharp. Try not to wear those old, ratty clothes that are in the back of your closet. And get a haircut.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Avoid strange, dead-end hallways in Bartlett Hall. They'll just get you lost and you'll be late for class. You never know where they might lead. Plus they might be filled with strange creatures that go "boo."

CANCER (June 21-July 22): That class you've been skipping all semester might have a pop quiz today, SO GO. Try not to fall asleep in your classes because the professors really don't like it very much.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Green is the color of the day for all those who are lion-hearted. Come on folks, it's lucky. If you're not wearing it, go home and change, quick.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept 22): Bagels figure strongly into your future plans. Be it breakfast, lunch or dinner, see what you can do to fulfill this astrologic destiny. Make a statement today about something that bothers you.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): This is the sign of the scales and if your life is off-balanced, it is no wonder. It will right itself soon, don't worry. Vegetables figure big in your life, weight loss might follow.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Romance will work itself out within the next few days. Clear answers to solutions will present themselves. Keep your chin up kids. Quit a bad habit befor it's too late.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Keep all situations in the proper perspective. Life is funky, go with it. Try a new culinary dish tonight. Despite the fact that classes are boring, attend them anyway.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan 19): Free your mind and the rest will follow. Your popularity will peak so make the best of it while you can. Make plans for the weekend now.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You can't hurry love, no you just have to wait. Make a dinner date with someone special, if you don't do it now you'll regret it. Spend your money on trivial things.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 26): Impulsive decisions are fun, make as many of those as you possibly can. Yesterday was the Monday schedule, not today so be sure and attend the right classes.

Just to get the old juices flowing, the State insect is the lady bug. That would fit nicely in Division I-A.

• You know UMass is back in the Yankee Conference chase when Coach Mike Hodges walks into the postgame interview and is dejected about a 22-point win.

• Did Jim Rudy really say, "A wise person learns not only from her own mistakes but the mistakes of others?" They should take away a couple of his 150 wins for that one.

Sa-lad coach. And here's to another buck fifty.

• How about a pat on the back for freshman Frank Alessio who broke his hand on the first play of Saturday's game and still scored two touchdowns. Gutsy.

• Hey Milt Cole, if you need any references in your quest for the Red Sox' general manager position don't be afraid to mention me. Haywood and I are like this.

• Matt Rajotte would certainly be on the All-Madden College team. The guy was dirty before the National Anthem and he sure can hit.

• With Marino out and the Bills vulnerable and the Jets being the Jets, I'd say the door is wide open for the Drew England (or is it SeculEngland?) to take the AFC East. Okay, maybe not wide open. Maybe a little ajar. You could at least fit a piece of paper in there.

• I saw where the new Superman series took on a new name and in honor of that UMass' dynamic basketball coaching duo will soon start filming "The Adventures of Carelli and Clark." No word yet on who will play Jimmy Olsen.

• How much more can Cam Neely withstand?

• Nice to see Pam Hixon getting some recognition as she approaches win number 250.

• The Shirl had planned on being ringside for next week's wrasslin' card but then she realized Roddy Piper and Jimmy Snuka won't be there.

"I had a nice kilt all ready for Piper," she said.

The Shirl — remembering the good ole days.

• Don't tell Coach Hodges, but UMass offensive coordinator Doug Berry and his defensive counterpart Bill McGovern had 'em in stitches the past two weeks at the sports luncheon. Those three could start the local version of "Coach."

• Your "Countdown to Calipari-isms" has reached 17 days and just to re-acclimate you, we'll provide a pre-Midnight Madness gem:

"Our fans are the greatest in the country, they root for us, not against the other team."

• Wouldn't it be nice if Acie Earl was a real find? With The Chief as his teacher, he should be in good shape regardless.

• Russ Yarworth would like to see all of you at Amherst College this weekend for the water polo New England Division Championships. There'll be an all inclusive Marco Polo game between matches.

Bad day for Minutewomen

By JONATHAN GANGI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team had high hopes as it traveled to Pennsylvania this past weekend to participate in the Paul Short Invitational Run. Unfortunately, the trip was disappointing.

The Minutewomen, who were previously ranked No. 1 in the Atlantic 10, finished 14th overall in a field of 32 teams. Coach Julie LaFreniere said she hoped they would do better.

"We should have been top 10," said LaFreniere.

A-10 foe St. Joseph's came out ahead of UMass and took over the top rank in the conference. UMass somehow fell to third in the coaches' poll behind URI, even though they defeated the Rams last weekend and in the regular season.

The invitational was the largest race the women's team has competed in, fielding nearly 250 runners. Seven nationally ranked schools were present, including No. 2 Villanova, No. 5 Penn State, and No. 8 Providence, who finished 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, respectively.

Freshman sensation Melissa Langevin was the first UMass runner to cross the line, coming in 55th overall in 18:22. Although suffering from an iron deficiency, junior transfer Kristin Diggs finished second for the team in only her second race as a Minutewoman.

The bright spot of the meet for the women was the performance of junior Julie Moreau, who, LaFreniere said, "ran one of the best races of her life." Moreau finished 3rd, trailing Langevin by only 18 seconds.

Hockey team preparing for long season ahead

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Amidst rumors of a structurally unsound roof and a change in the school's mascot, the University of Massachusetts hockey program held its first media day in 15 years Wednesday at the William D. Mullins Center.

The media day provided the opportunity to shake off more weighty matters of the University and gave Coach Joe Mallen a chance to unveil the new UMass home and away uniforms.

"They were designed this summer, and the uniforms are a little different," said Mallen. "They're patterned after the Czechoslovakian team's jerseys which I saw a few years ago."

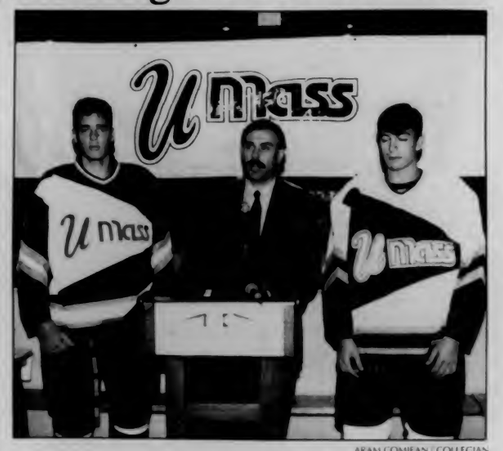
Former Massachusetts high school stars Rob Bonneau, from Chicopee, and Rich Alger, from Barnstable, modelled the jerseys, which Mallen said were not unlike the National Hockey League's Anaheim Mighty Ducks uniform.

"They're a little bit different, a bit more European," he said. "The manufacturer said the design couldn't be done — then the ideas we were talking about showed up in the Mighty Ducks uniform."

Many of the players were chomping at the bit Wednesday, eager to get the roster trimmed down and eager to trade grueling conditioning for preseason and regular season games.

"It's been real tough," said forward Judd Smith, who played for Cushing Academy in Leominster. "We practice every day except one, and we have two-a-days three times a week when we skate at 6 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. On the weekends, we've had dry land conditioning, which started at 8 a.m.

"It's definitely gonna pay off," he said. "[The practices] really brought the team together."



"It's so much faster of a pace," Bonneau said. "I've never had to get up and skate at 6 a.m. and then go to classes. I don't think any of us realized how big a jump it was."

"I can't wait for the games to start," said Tiger Holland, a defenseman who played at Catholic Memorial. "I'm really looking forward to getting things started. It's been quite a transition so far."

The team takes on Penn State in the practice rink on Sunday, Oct. 17 at 2 p.m. in a scrimmage. The season opener is Oct. 23 at Merrimack.

Everyone on the squad is an experienced hockey player, but the team does not have one game of collegiate experience among them. The players said they realize they won't have a perfect season.

"We're all freshmen, we're all gonna do things wrong in the first year," said Bonneau. "But we want to show that we aren't a team that can be taken lightly."

Potent offense, strong D triggers UMass win

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

The Minutewoman field hockey team avoided a letdown yesterday as Coach Pam Hixon's squad crushed Dartmouth at Totman Field, upping its winning streak to 11.

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

If ever a team were ripe for an upset, it was the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, riding the crest of a 10-game winning streak. If ever a day was conducive for an upset, it was Wednesday afternoon — a sunny, raw, windy, cold day.

All the elements were present, including a 3-6 Dartmouth squad which had just defeated No. 13 New Hampshire, but the Minutewomen were having no part of it.

Massachusetts	5

Instead of going through the motions hoping the win would fall into their laps, Massachusetts came firing out of the gate, scoring two quick goals en route to a 5-0 victory over the Big Green.

"Coming in, I told the team that we had to play to win, and not play not to lose," said Minutewoman Coach Pam Hixon, who was the feature of a Boston Globe story Wednesday detailing the success the field hockey program has enjoyed over the years.

The win makes it 11 in a row for the No. 3 ranked Minutewomen (11-1), who moved up a spot from last week's national poll, and also 247 for Hixon, who is closing in on win No. 250.

Senior co-captain Tara Jelley started the Massachusetts goal fest when she scored unassisted at 7:02. Jelley took the ball in front of the Dartmouth net and shot one to the right past Dartmouth goalkeeper Lauren Demski. The goal was Jelley's eighth of the year.

The Minutewomen made it 2-0 five minutes later at 12:04 when senior Jenn Salisbury took a rebound and pushed it past Demski for her fourth tally of the season.

"When we scored those two goals early, it kind of sewed it up for us," Hixon said.

Massachusetts wasn't satisfied with the two-goal lead and managed to register two more scores before the end of the first half. Junior sweeper Natalie Hart scored on a penalty corner blast, which has become the trademark of the Minutewoman offense, at 24:30, assisted by Salisbury and senior co-captain Holly Hockenbrock.

Hockenbrock, Hart, and Salisbury combined for another penalty corner score at 27:07, with Hockenbrock doing the honors this time for her second goal of the season.

The final Massachusetts goal was a carbon copy of the third, with Hockenbrock and Salisbury setting up Hart for her 12th goal of the year at 55:49.

The consistently strong Minutewoman defense, led by senior co-captain Tracy Barclay, sophomore Andrea Cabral, and juniors Kyri Sparks and Colleen Duffy, turned in another yeoman's effort, allowing only four shots against the goalie duo of freshman starter Hilary Rose and sophomore Stacy Walker.

The big lead enabled Hixon to go to the bench and play the backup players, who ran out the clock for the Massachusetts victory.

Minutemen outlast Huskies

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team combined a strong defense and a Randy Jacobs' goal to defeat Northeastern Wednesday at Garber Field, 1-0. It was a much needed win for the Minutemen, who won consecutive games for the first time this year.

Northeastern	0
Massachusetts	1

The UMass (4-9, 2-4 in A-10) defense was solid all afternoon, forcing Freshmen goalie Brackie Reyes to only make six saves all day. The Minutemen did a great job in their own end, picking up the Northeastern attackers every time.

"Brackie is great at controlling the defenders in front of him, and deserves credit for keeping the shot total low," said assistant coach Rob Donnenwirth.

The Huskies (7-5) controlled the beginning of the game, but Reyes was able to turn several decent scoring chances away. Ten minutes into the action he stopped

SPEED of LIGHT

By JEFF COKER
Collegian Staff

"To see a world in a grain of sand
And heaven in a wildflower,
Hold infinity in the palm of your hand
And eternity in an hour."
–William Blake

It has been called, and very well may be the most "powerful, multimedia, mind-blowing, psychedelic light show and freak-out dance experience" of the season, and it's coming to the University of Massachusetts tonight.

John Dwork's Speed of Light Show presents the specifics of Gaia activity, with a motive for appreciation of planetary interrelationships.

Without the slightest doubt, you too can perceive the stimuli - virtually thousands of computer dissolved slides, phenomenal film footage and extraordinary effects, all to capture your interest and pull you into a real-life fantasy.

According to Speed of Light Productions, Dwork loads cinema film and slides into programmable projectors that can slide dissolve, causing segues and transactions smoothly from one image to the next, as well as superimposing several images, leaving each image clear and legible.

The sequence of images is choreographed to music coaster. A might beautiful flower might be projected, then overlaid by a mandala, followed by the face of a child.

Sponsored by the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition and supported by a S.A.C.E.F. grant, the Speed of Light show, a form of hieroglyphic thought conceptualized by William Irwin Thompson, will travel with the mind through an unforgettable journey of "magic and mystical adventure."

The Speed of Light Show is happening tonight at 8 p.m. in the UMass Student Union Ballroom. Tickets in advance are available at Tix Unlimited or at the door for $5.

Experience acoustic therapy with Bob Mould

By DANA L. FORRAR
Collegian Staff

Last time Bob Mould came around, he said he wouldn't be doing this kind of gig anymore. Then he formed the band Sugar and his electric-driven sound went on tour. Now the force behind the legendary trio Husker Du is back on a solo acoustic tour, and Amherst College has him this Saturday night.

Bob Mould treats his solo acoustic tour as therapy, a confidence booster after the larger, more produced shows.

"I realized I didn't need a gigantic machine," he said. "I can drive myself," he said.

Mould has always been an independent artist, almost to the point of being stubborn. His years with Grant Hart and Husker Du helped create the aura of the power trio (reincarnated now in Nirvana and others). But he and Hart often saw eye-to-foot on ways a song should be arranged, not your Lennon-McCartney relationship, more like Moe and Curly.

"I was trusting other people's opinions," he says. "Working with people who had a different vision of me."

Bob Mould's "hits" (songs that reached mainstream) include "Could You be The One," "See a Little Light," "Heipless," "Hoover Dam" and "If I Can't Change Your Mind."

Despite limited mainstream airplay, Bob Mould still has quite a following, including Indigo Girls, who call Mould a solid musical influence.

The sound of Bob Mould has rolled with his emotional ups and downs; from his loud young man stage in Husker Du, to his more subtle, introspective solo album, Workbook. He followed that with a louder, more dramatic, sometimes morbid, always brilliant album, Black Sheets of Rain, with "It's Too Late" and "Stop Your Crying" as standouts.

"If I ride on the rails, I shall ride them alone/And if I need all this pain I will find it alone."

He slowed down again after he left his management and record label with his previous solo acoustic tour, but picked right back up again with his refound confidence to do his most mature work to date with Sugar. Now he's hit the road again without the 'gigantic machine,' just his guitar and his voice, and his harsh melodic style.

Bob Mould will be playing all of his material. That means Husker Du, solo, Sugar songs, as well as "some brand spankin' new" stuff. Be ready for anything.

"I've done a couple of lifetimes' worth of stuff already," Mould said. "I don't know if I can change the world anymore. All I can do now is enjoy the time I have left here making music."

Vic Chesnutt will open the show.

Bob Mould will play Buckley Recital Hall at Amherst College Saturday at 8 p.m. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. for this general admission show. Tickets $10 for Amherst College students; $15 for others. Available at the AC Campus Center and For The Record in Amherst.

A mix of fun and finance

Half a World Away
by Emily Marino

Whoever said that business and pleasure do not mix obviously has never met 20-year-old marketing major Dilsad Cire. A first year Turkish student from Istanbul, Cire is proving that not every business major pictures the same pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

Cire decided to come to UMass after completing a six month intensive English course at UCLA last year. Having heard of the excellent reputation of Eastern schools and Boston in general, she applied to all five colleges in the valley and enrolled at UMass, impressed with the diversity of the campus and the renowned School of Management.

With a marketing degree, Cire plans to return to Turkey where her family owns a business and where she can practice the import/export and commerce skills that she acquires here.

Cire claims that the number of Turkish women who go into business is larger in the bigger cities, like her own Istanbul. She feels that her opportunity to work is not necessarily greater in the U.S., as employment is hard to come by in both countries.

The benefits of working in her home country include being part of a family business, a common practice in Turkey.

"Many of the biggest [businesses] are really big family companies," she said, adding that the number of women hired depends entirely on the firm.

Turkey's textile and fashion industries are booming, according to Cire, creating a demand for qualified business folk. She also claims that due to the fact that Turkey is still a developing nation, the need for commerce is great.

"Here [in the U.S.] is all set, Turkey is all changing. We have new companies, new ideas, new everything. Of course we need trade markets a lot, maybe more than here," Cire said.

An international focus is incorporated into the lives of Turkish High School students who are able to choose a foreign language to study and attend a school offering courses primarily in that language. Cire studied Italian, and slips into the language even more easily than English, which she speaks well.

However, Cire appreciates her free time as much as the education that she is receiving at UMass. A huge music fan (Industrial and Gothic are her favorites,) she loves to go out dancing, and has a collection of CD's and posters which she plans on taking back to Turkey with her. In addition, Cire claims that the valley offers "a much better night life" than what she is used to.

She is also a member of the Turkish club, an organization that hopes to sponsor events like Turkish movies, guest lectures, and festivals with traditional foods and folk dances of Turkey.

"I don't think people know a lot about Turkey," she says. Cire adds that stereotypes of villainous jail bailiffs and general corruption have been promoted here by movies such as Midnight Express. While Cire smiles these stereotypes off as figments of Hollywood, she admits that by exaggerating the political problems in her country, this type of media leaves most Americans with a very inaccurate picture of Turkey.

Half a world away, the picture for Dilsad Cire is one of a bright future of opportunity and achievement. For this dedicated student and avid Industrial music fan understands that all work and no play is just no fun for anyone.

Lifeless Mr. Jones; sublime King of the Hill

Richard Gere and Lena Olin play lovers in "Mr. Jones."

THE REEL WORLD
by Jon Lupo

First, the bad news.

The movie romance has been enjoying a renaissance recently, with sappy (Benny & Joon), syrupy (The Bodyguard) and seductive (The Crying Game) results. But you wouldn't know it with Mr. Jones, a dull psycho boy-meets psycho(logist)-girl story that manages to be both boring and passionless.

Richard Gere stars as the title character (he's so charming he doesn't have a first name), a wild n' crazy guy who likes to jump on the stage during concerts and conduct his own "Ode to Joy," practice his Zen balance on top of rooftops, and kiss random women on the street.

More weird than eccentric, he's also manic depressive. Unlike Benny & Joon, which edited out any references to Joon's schizophrenia, Mr. Jones doesn't mind getting clinical when it comes to its namesake's woes. He comes under the care of Dr. Libbie Bowen (Lena Olin), a stressed-out shrink who's on the rebound.

Wanna take a guess right now as to what happens?

Mr. Jones is so dry and uninvolving you almost wish it was more convoluted, if only so it would be watchable. Mr. Jones follows its predictable path like it's a death sentence. The tone of Mr. Jones is so sullen and pointless, the film winds up being a detached, spiritless bore.

Gere and Olin's utterly inanimate performances only serve to accentuate their lack of chemistry. Gere, who was so good in the tragi-romantic Sommersby, is all smug-filled tics as the troubled Mr. Jones. Lena Olin is so caught up the film's psycho-babble undertones that she forgets to be alive. The cool fire of The Unbearable Lightness of Being

Tuneful fluff from Buffalo Tom

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Occupying the tape player in Gustav, my trusty Civic wagon, has been a tape, the same tape for many a week. There are many reasons for this. For one, any tape I own is a gift from someone else as I have made a successful and costly transition into the age of CDs. Additionally, this tape I speak of is good.

Occupying the cheapo, dawn-of-man CD player in my dorm have been numerous CDs, but only one has earned the attention of my ears for the past four days. It's also good, really good.

With this brief disclaimer and apologia for my journalistic slack, here's three pretty new releases worthy of your attention.

Buffalo Tom
[big red letter day]
Beggars Banquet

Did you know UMass has produced many a fine band such as internationally renowned Dinosaur Jr. and national favorites Buffalo Tom?

It's doubtful that this pitch would generate too many dollars for Telefund, but it's reason enough to support your local alumni. Buffalo Tom is one of the finest UMass products to hit the big time. Their latest, [big red letter day] solidifies their genuine and appealing output.

Regrettably, day does not show more than a few baby steps from Buffalo Tom's previous effort, last year's Let Me Come Over. Nonetheless, we're churned a batch of completely magnetic guitar-driven pop tunes.

The Bill Janovitz croon is at its strongest and most emotional on "Would not be Denied," a moody refrain. "Sodajerk" and "Suppose" are just good clean fun. The presence of a wonderful droning and distorted guitar riff and lively vocals make "Suppose" the clear winner. Hopefully Tom will utilize little tricks like these to bolster their next release and progress further and farther from the Valley. B

Some bands try to do too much and don't have the talent to back it up. Whenever You're Ready is actually the second LP from this Northwest foursome.

Flop's latest is a convoluted tapestry of tunes and sound bites with no focus or cohesion. From the irritating derivative hooks of "A. Wylie" to the modern-day "Yellow Submarine" entitled "A Fixed Point," Flop never put their

The Player, Last Crusade best bets on HSCN

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

I recently survived the cold going around, so I was able to enjoy a lot of the last week's movies. This week's movies are consistently good too, but only two get my strong recommendation — Indiana Jones & the Last Crusade and The Player. I think I'll go out on my own and recommend a movie you should rent.

The Lover is an outstanding film that not only shows how great love is, but the devastation felt when it ends. Having experienced this recently, this movie doesn't help or offer advice (I don't think any movie could), but makes you realize that you're not the only person this has happened to. It's definitely worth seeing.

HSCN Reviews

Wayne's World — When this movie came out in the movies, I recommended it to everyone, but now I'm not quite so quick. So many people have imitated Wayne and Garth that I'm sick of it. Basically, the plot is a takeoff on the popular "Saturday Night Live" skit about two young guys who broadcast a TV show out of their basement. There are some really funny scenes (like the spoof on "Laverne & Shirley"), but overexposure has ruined this movie. B-

1492 Conquest of Paradise — Director Ridley Scott bit off more than he can chew with this epic. Gerard Depardieu plays an obsessed Christopher Columbus, the first Westerner to discover North America. The correlation between his quest and the space program is probably the only interesting idea in the movie. The fact the movie is over three hours long doesn't help either. C

Beverly Hills Cop — Eddie Murphy plays Axel Foley, a Detroit cop who goes to Beverly Hills to solve the murder of his friend. It's another one those comedy-action movies that always seems to be pumped out. This one is better than most due to Murphy's strong performance. B

City of Joy — I probably should state right off that I can't stand Patrick Swayze, the star of this picture. I was forced to see this movie anyway, and I still didn't like it. Swayze plays an indifferent self-centered doctor who goes to Calcutta and joins a cause, soon after becoming a generally good guy. There isn't a doubt from the beginning that he wouldn't and the movie remains predictable until the very end. If you want to see an excellent movie that has the same theme, rent The Killing Fields instead. C+

That wacky trio of "Honeymoon In Vegas."

Commando — Ah-nold plays a marine on a mission to get his daughter back. Mayhem ensues. If you like your action movies light of plot and with a lot of violence, this one is for you; not me. D

Flatliners — Four medical students try to see how long they can stay dead in order to see what it's like (they're sober when they think of this too). An interesting idea, but it gets carried away when each of them tries to one-up the others by staying under longer. Kiefer Sutherland makes the movie worth watching. He has a haunted look throughout the film that totally fits the part. B

Groundhog Day — Bill Murray plays a weatherman disenchanted with life. He is sent to cover a Groundhog Day ceremony in a happy-go-lucky small town. Funny things happen when he has to keep living the same day over and over again. B+

Heathers — This one has a strong cult following, but I can't say I'm crazy about it. This black comedy about peer pressure, suicide and the ridiculousness of cliques in high school is interesting in a bizarre sort of way. Winona Ryder plays Veronica, one of the girls in the sadistically cool clique. She falls for J.D. (Christian Slater), who decides to start murdering some of these cool people. If you don't like the movie, entertain yourself by watching how much Slater rips off Jack Nicholson in The Witches of Eastwick. B+

Hoffa — Speaking of Jack, he stars in this biographical picture of the notorious leader of the Teamster's Union. The main problem with the movie is after two hours you really don't know anything more about Jimmy Hoffa at all. Nicholson does put in a superb performance though. B-

Honeymoon in Vegas — Nicholas Cage saves this movie, without him it wouldn't be nearly as good. Cage plays a guy who bets his wife (Sarah Jessica Parker) for a weekend in a card game. He loses of course, and the fun begins as he tries to get her back. The highlight of the movie is definitely the scene with the Flying Elvises. An enjoyable break from school — check out if you can. B

Indiana Jones & the Last Crusade — The final installment in the three-part series is an exceptional sequel. The first fifteen minutes of the movie are simply amazing. River Phoenix plays a young Indie who steals back a treasure from some plunderers.

Harrison Ford takes back the role for the duration of the film in search of the Holy Grail, this time accompanied by his father, played by Sean Connery. Ford and Connery work well together, the dry humor is quite funny. See this movie. A

Leap of Faith — I hated this movie. When I go to the movies I usually stay until the end no matter how bad. I could not sit through this garbage, it annoyed me that much. The usually likable Steve Martin plays a faith healer who

Sci-fi schlock comes to town

Catch sly cult fave Mystery Science Theater 3000

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Grim yet gleeful tidings are in order this weekend for those University of Massachusetts students who laugh in the face, and the stilted dialogue, of such Creature Double Feature faves as The Creeping Flesh and Destroy All Monsters.

This Saturday October 16, the cable cult hit Mystery Science Theater 3000 opens its tour at the Campus Center Auditorium for a two show laughfest, kicking off and subsequently roasting the Halloween season.

Theater, entering its third season, is a comedy staple on the cable station Comedy Central, airing weeknights at midnight and weekend evenings at 7 p.m. Comedy Central describes the show's format as an arena where "cheesy films are reviewed by a man and two robots made from a lacrosse helmet and a gumball machine."

The show's premise, which lampoons past sci-fi shlock melodramas, concerns the misadventures of a blue-collar worker from Earth thrust into space by his nefarious employers.

He is condemned to repeated viewings of an onslaught of the sludge of American pop-culture, the B-movies, which he and his robot buddies verbally shred with a slew of double entrendes and bad puns.

If it all sounds so irreverent, it is, but the show instantly adheres itself to even the most serious of souls, due to its impressive array of pop-cultural references and in-jokes.

As the films play out (any Roger Corman flick will do), the silhouettes of the three players lurk at the bottom of the television screen, spewing an unending stream of "wiseguy" criticism. Where else could viewers tune into The Golden Voyage of Sinbad, and hear a muffled "Goodbye Mr. Hoffa" as a swashbuckling extra hurls a large sack into the ocean?

The Mystery Science Theater 3000 College Tour, scanning twenty-five universities in the United States, is corporate sponsored by 1 800 O·P·E·R·A·T·O·R (a service of AT & T). The UMass Science Fiction Society and the Collegiate Advantage are responsible for luring the tour to campus.

The tour stops for a one night performance Saturday evening, with two shows at 7:30 and 9 p.m. Admission is free but the first eighty people will receive MST3 posters and Comedy Central T-shirts.

and Enemies: A Love Story is missing in this film. Both Gere and Olin seem to be sleepwalking through this sickly, sedative-eque romp.

As far as the rest of the film is concerned, Mr. Jones should take two Prozac and call me when he gets a life.

Now, the good news.

Not only one of the best films of the year, but arguably one of the best films about childhood ever is King of the Hill. Steven Soderbergh's (sex, lies and videotape) passionate and sublimely resonate adaptation of A.E. Hotchner's Depression-era memoir is superlative filmmaking, a journey through one boy's magical and awe-inspiring coming of age and tender self-realization.

Newcomer Jesse Bradford makes a truly auspicious debut as young Aaron Kuriander, a clever kid who lives in a run-down hotel in St. Louis with his family. After his relatives depart, one by one, through various circumstances, Aaron must learn to live alone — a situation that fuels both a sad and thrilling personal voyage.

Soderbergh manages to create one stunner of a scene after another. There's one particular moment where Aaron — starving and pennliess — cuts out pictures of food from magazines, arranges them on a plate and eats the paper. Perfect performances add to this expertly crafted film, one which not only deserves our attention, but our admiration.

(An expanded review will appear when the film opens in the area.) Mr. Jones: D King of the Hill: A

Vertex to host Reggae Fest

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Sounds that elicit visions of Jamaica, wacky tobacky, and dreds will be wafting through the Vertex Night Club on Route 9 in Hadley this Friday night. Reggae Fest brings together local music makers, the New Horizon band with Boston disc jockey, D.J. Cutts.

Two University of Massachusetts students, Massimo Castellano and Michael Morris, are promoting this event. They started their production company, M & M Productions, this semester.

"We worked in Boston clubs this summer, and we wanted to bring some of that city entertainment to Amherst," says Morris, a senior communications major. "A Reggae Fest has never been done before in this area."

"D.J. Cutts is 'cutting edge'," said senior legal studies major Castellano. "We wanted to organize parties at UMass to be as successful as the clubs in Boston. Cutts has played at Venus, Axis, and Local 186."

Both Morris and Castellano say they look forward to putting on more parties like the Reggae Fest. They also have a Retro party in the works.

"We will contine to put together entertainment for older students," said Morris. "Friday's show will provide free beer, but it is an 18 plus show."

Tickets for the Reggae Fest are $6 in advance and $8 at the door. This 18+ show begins at 8 p.m. Friday night. Call 549-7766 for tickets.

feet on the ground long enough to define a sound.

The goofy but invigorating roller-coaster ride of "The Great Valediction" is the theme to "Bonanza" on speed. It's the album's highpoint, along with "Regrets," a plodding and driven anthem.

It's not always necessary to record everything you think of. C

David Gray
A Century Ends
Caroline

With a throat of shagged rock and a bard's tongue, David Gray is living in the wrong decade, perhaps even the wrong century. I know nothing about his background, I only know the Welsh-born singer's album is pretty recent and totally breathtaking.

"Cast your eyes into the distance/try to focus on it all/find a spirit of resistance/instead of pride before the fall," croons Gray on the title track, his take on subtle rebellion in a degradating society.

Gray is a poet and a balladeer. His tunes come from a place much deeper than most, accompanied only by acoustic guitar, occasional dubbed backup vocals and his scraggly and very Welsh voice that's been dragged over sandpaper and treated with whiskey.

Beginning with the crescendo of "Shine" and ending miles down the road with "It's All Over," on A Century Ends, Caroline has discovered a product which will probably go unnoticed.

Gray is not a diamond in the rough, he is the diamond and the rough. A rips people off who are to gullible to know better. Guess what happens before the movie is over — surprise, surprise — an actual miracle. F

The Player — It may be totally self-indulgent on my part to recommend this movie, but hey, I'm a film major so I have to. Basically the movie is a satire of how Hollywood works, by focusing on one producer (Tim Robbins) who is receiving death threats from a writer he rejected. There isn't much (if any) laugh-out-loud humor in the movie, it's much more subtle than that, but it still is very entertaining. A

Movies not reviewed on HSCN this week: Jason and the Argonauts, The Super, Chaplin, The Howling, Lawnmower Man, Shadow Play, and Nowhere to Run.

GEO voices its demands

Cynicism and mockery mark graduate demonstration

LESLIE WEINSTOCK / COLLEGIAN

Members of the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO) congregate outside Whitmore during yesterday's protest rally.

By DARIENNE HOSLEY and TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

"Bubble, Bubble, toil & trouble; meet our contract on the double," was one of the preferred chants by members of the Graduate Employment Organization at their first rally of the year yesterday.

Almost 100 people gathered on the Student Union steps yesterday with bubbles and noisemakers to protest stalled negotiations with the administration.

GEO is trying to negotiate for stipend increases, health care for domestic partners, dental and optical coverage in health plans and affirmative action and sexual harassment policies. These are all benefits which GEO said the administration has denied them.

"For the past few months the administration has refused to move at all," Wendy Mataya, co-speaker of the GEO, said.

Matt McDonald, a graduate student in labor studies, was dressed in golf clothes and carrying a golf bag. He was representing Chancellor David K. Scott.

James Delle, a graduate student in anthropology, said GEO has been meeting with the administration since July.

"They tried to deny us our right to organize and our right to a fair contract," Delle said. "And we showed them we are a force to be reckoned with."

"We, on the negotiating team, believe grad students on this campus are not being paid enough," he said. "The administration says we are. We disagree."

Doug Fulton, a graduate student in economics, showed up at the rally in a suit and tie, dressed as President Michael K. Hooker. He carried trash bags full of "money" and handed out "Mike money."

A skit was performed in which representatives from various groups requested money from the president. The chancellor, vice-president and staff all received the money they requested.

Graduate students were told "we're in a budget crisis," the skit was entitled "The Budget Allocation Process."

About 60 members of GEO proceeded to march over to Whitmore to confront Scott. Upon arrival, they found the doors to his office locked.

They stayed for about 10-15 minutes and chanted at the door. They left five trash bags full of "money" and slid the "Mike money" through the cracks in the door.

Tower library faces possible name change

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

Changing the 20-year-old mascot is not breaking tradition, according to Charles Lenchner, head of the Radical Student Union.

"There is little at the University that is newer," said Lenchner, "and the logo is mainly used only by sports teams."

A petition was issued last Tuesday citing four major goals of multiculturalism, diversity and accessibility. Goal number four is to change the University of Massachusetts mascot. Lenchner is one of the authors of the petition and his organization supports it.

At a rally last Tuesday, Martin Jones, president of the American Freedom Foundation, addressed the issue of changing the mascot, finding the symbol of a white man holding a gun offensive.

"Martin Jones chose to focus on the fourth goal, because it is important to him," Lenchner said. "But it is the least important one on the petition, our focus is for a more diversified campus."

According to Lenchner, the focus on the mascot issue has overshadowed the other three issues.

The circulating petition also calls for "increasing the enrollment of African American, Latin American, Asian American and Native American (ALANA) students to 20 percent at the graduate level, and a similar percentage at the undergraduate level; to increase the availability of scholarships for economically disadvantaged students; and to name the tower library after the African-American educator, scholar, organizer and leader, W.E.B. Du Bois."

"The real focus of our petition is to rename the tower library," Lenchner said. "There are no buildings on campus named for ALANA people or women."

Lenchner said as far as the mascot was concerned, the issue is to promote discussion for a symbol to represent a diversified campus.

President of the Student Government Association David Nunez and Student Trustee Al Lizana, as well as Shyamala Ivatury, president of the Graduate Student Senate, have signed the petition.

A rally is scheduled for next Thursday after which students will go to Whitmore to present the petition to the Chancellor.

Lenchner said the only demand they expect immediately addressed is that of the library.

U.S. captive emerges a battered, free man

By MICHELLE FAUL
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — U.S. helicopter pilot Michael Durant, battered but buoyant, returned to freedom Thursday on a stretcher after 11 days as a captive of a Somali warlord.

The United States said no deal was made for the release of Durant, captured in an Oct. 3 battle between U.N. troops and Mohamed Farrah Aidid's fighters, and of a Nigerian private captured in a Sept. 5 gunfight.

Aidid emerged with an enhanced stature as a result of the release, which he came out of hiding to announce at a news conference.

The freeing of Durant spurred more calls from Congress for speeding up the departure of U.S. troops from Somalia, and President Clinton indicated he might be flexible on his Mar. 31 deadline for withdrawal.

Durant, 32, clenched his teeth and his eyes teared as he was carried out on a stretcher from a walled compound and handed over to Red Cross representatives. He clutched a note from his wife and parents that the Red Cross gave him just before his release. He declined to speak to reporters.

Dr. John Holcomb of the 46th U.S. Army Field Hospital said the pilot suffered a broken leg, broken cheekbone and a fractured back, but appeared to have been treated fairly well by his captors. The leg was in a splint, but had not been set and was quite painful, Holcomb said.

"Mike is fine, basically," Holcomb said, adding that Durant "cried a little bit."

He said most of Durant's injuries probably were sustained when a rocket propelled grenade blasted the tail off his helicopter, although Durant said in an interview while he was in captivity that he had been badly beaten by a crowd and stripped naked after his capture.

Craft Center troubled

Budget confusion at root of instability

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

Downstairs in the Student Union there is a facility that students pass on their way to class every day. It is used by 4,000-6,000 students a year for artistic expression or relaxation purposes.

It is a non-profit organization that faces only three more years of financial stability before hardships might cause closure.

The organization that is under the Student Union steps is the University Craft Center.

The Craft Center is student-staffed and is funded in part by the Student Activities Fund. Due to cuts by the art department, there has been a rise in the number of students seeking outlets for artistic expression. The center also caters to non-art majors and offers crafts for students in leather, silver, pottery and beading.

"It is one of the few facilities that reaches across the board regardless of age or race," said Stacey Lindell, a graduate student and the assistant director of the Craft Center. The center is educationally focused in providing materials at a low cost for students, and for sponsoring artists in residence.

According to the center, budget cuts by the Board of Governors will cause extreme financial difficulty. In attempts to salvage a budget crisis, the Student Government Association and the Graduate Student Senate budgeted money to the center.

In the budget, the BOG allocated money to only support the professional staff, and did not include the graduate assistant, student payroll or equipment because of what the board called "a financial bind."

According to the '93 Center budget, an additional $2,774 promised by the former BOG chair, Ben Preston, was never transferred into the Craft Center Account.

According to the Center, Chairman George Fitzgerald will not honor the former promise by the chair.

"I asked the former chair repeatedly

Conference on world nutrition

Raising awareness is the goal of the Tenth World Food Day Teleconference, according to Dr. John Cunningham of the food and nutrition department here on campus.

"The Teleconference is to educate people about the situation of world food security," Cunningham said.

A group of panelists moderated by CBS-TV Washington Newscaster, Miriam Hernandez, will discuss world food security with regard to its demands, environmental changes, preservation of ecosystems and genetic division in plants. The discussion will follow this year's theme, "Seeds of Conflict: Biodiversity and Food Security."

The broadcast will include two films, Green Gold - From Maya to the Moon, and Seeds. Following the films will be a viewer call-in session by which viewers may call in with questions for the panelists.

The teleconference, which is being held in accordance with World Food day on October 16, will air on Housing Services Cable Network on October 15 in order to coincide with academic schedules.

Campus Pond to receive much needed dredging

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

"We were all sick of the way the pond looked," said Ali Tehrani of the SETA sponsored Campus Pond clean-up happening this Saturday between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m.

According to Tehrani, president and co-founder of the student group, this idea stemmed from a meeting of the organization about a month ago. He said members were tired of the bad smell coming from the end of the pond near the Fine Arts Center and felt it was time for some action.

After speaking with University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott, Thomas Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs and Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance, SETA received a big nod of approval.

"We're very excited about it and very supportive," said Page.

SETA then sent out letters to all of the registered student organizations inviting them to participate in the day long effort. According to Tehrani, various RSO's, such as AHORA, University Program Council (UPC), MASSPIRG and the UMass Theater Guild have expressed interest in helping to clean out the pond.

Albert Potter, head of grounds and transportation, said the Physical Plant will be providing tools, such as shovels, rakes, boots and gloves, for the students who do show up and help out. There will also be supervisors on hand to oversee the project.

When asked when the last time the Campus Pond was dredged out and cleaned, Potter said he honestly cannot recall the last time, if at all, that had be done through the pond's extensive history.

Page is interested in implementing a program similar to "Adopt a Highway," in which student organizations will be allowed to "adopt" a particular sight on campus. They would be in charge of patrolling and cleaning that sight. He encourages students who have ideas or who are interested in doing programs like SETA's to contact him or the physical plant.

SETA is a UMass student group that represents the Middle Eastern students on the campus. In Persian, SETA means three, which in turn represents power, courage and knowledge.

All students who are interested in giving a helping hand are encouraged to show up at the pond at anytime throughout the day.

Stereotypes affect community

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

"We can not change the past. But we can change the present. We can change the future forever," said Jack Hasegawa.

Speaking before a small group in the Campus Center, Hasegawa shared stories about growing up, the history of the Asian-American community and the problems with being called the "model minority."

To help bring an understanding in the subject he was going to discuss, Hasegawa shared statistics and history about Asians throughout the world.

He said the 60 percent of the world population are Asians, and the rate of growth of Asians in America is seven percent higher than any other group.

Hasegawa then touched upon the problem of the media's representation of Asians and Asian-Americans. He talked about the accents and general stereotyping of Asians in the movies and on television.

"Star Trek was a groundbreaking movie for us because the white people had to have accents and we didn't," said Hasegawa.

Hasegawa discussed the cover Newsweek had a couple of years ago declaring Asians as the "Model Minority." He said this distinction has many hidden poisons and increases tensions between the communities.

Asian-Americans and their role in the American work force is confusing subject, said Hasegawa, because of the stereotypes higher management carries about the community. He talked about a company in New Jersey who could not figure out why 40 percent of the Asian-American recruits would leave by their third year in training.

After interviewing those who left, Hasegawa found that Asian-American's were being passed up for managerial positions because they "were too valuable in the technical side."

These workers, also, had dead-end jobs because they were hired for the top engineering positions coming into the company. Ultimately, they would leave and contract their expertise out to other companies and were able to decide what they wanted.

He even pointed out within the past five years while working with 26 colleges and 50-60 companies, he has only met one Asian-American College dean, and one Asian-American that has a managerial position not in the technical side of a company.

"No matter what happens Asian-American's are still under represented, even with their accomplishments," said Hasegawa.

Rejection hits at young age

By TROY L. MERRICK

When a fifth-grader asked Vivian Gussin Paley, grade-school teacher and noted childhood educator and author, if she made up the term "you can't say you can't play," she had to say she had not. She only made up the words, the idea is very old.

"Although we all begin school as strangers, some of us never seem comfortable or accepted," she said.

She said she formulated her "you can't say you can't play" message from an ideal in the Bible.

Paley, whose most recent book is of the same name as her philosophy, said the message has helped enhance her life and those of her young students.

"Becoming a teacher didn't solve my problem," she said. "Strangers hide their feelings and I hid mine and pretended to be a strong teacher. But suddenly I was the pharaoh and I had my own land to rule."

The way she presented her discoveries was often humorous. Describing why she became a teacher, she chuckled, "I couldn't think of anything else to do with my liberal arts degree."

She admits her first 15 years of teaching went

Cancer awareness to take on artistic forms

By JOY COLLINS
Collegian Staff

October is National Breast Cancer Awareness month. On Monday, October 18, from noon to 6pm, the art installation "Women's Answers to Breast Cancer" will open on the UMASS Campus.

The installation will be composed of thirteen stations assembled along the footpath from the Campus Center to the Southwest tunnel. Each station will highlight a different issue related to breast cancer.

Sunny Miller, a MFA student at the University, is coordinating the project. Miller said one of the goals of the project is to make the issue of breast cancer "approachable".

"We need to bring the issue from an abstract possibility to one relevant to daily life," Miller said.

The project will use a variety of methods to communicate its message including personal accounts, readings, art work, skits and vocal improvisations as well as information on research findings.

Miller said she "felt the need to create an arena where 'profound information could be shared in an aesthetic context.'"

The installation will give people the opportunity to discuss and raise questions about breast cancer in "a less medicinal surrounding" and to "look at this quantity and breadth and of information within the context of community", Miller said.

The stations, many of which involve viewer participation, are designed to provoke thought and curiosity. One station will invite people to take off their shoes. At another, the public can "use clay to make sculptures that will draw them to vital lifestyle changes."

The last station will invite the community to join in a "musical collaboration" of chanting or singing in the Southwest tunnel, in an effort to "reclaim the appropriateness of emotional expression," Miller said.

Miller said she is pleased with the dedication of the participants and volunteers, but still needs and welcomes additional help.

"We still need donations of shirts, shoes, leaves and hay to finish some of the pieces," Miller said. "We would love to have help setting up at noon on Sunday."

Miller also said she welcomes any additional participants who want to share their stories or experiences about breast cancer.

For more information, please contact Sunny Miller at 545-4066.

Why UMass shouldn't change Minuteman

Mascot stands for freedom

Where would the United States be today if it were not for the minutemen? These men fought for our basic rights that we today take for granted. Having the Minutemen as a mascot for the University is not derogatory, by any means, to any student. We simply have a mascot that stands for freedom.

William G. Slek
Amherst

Too much negative publicity

If the American Freedom Federation is so bent, then let's change the mascot. The next question is to what? Someone will always find something wrong with the mascot we have at the university. I could see a valid reason to change the mascot if the university used it to promote sexism or racism in any way, but this is clearly not the case. The Chancellor could spend his time more effectively trying to obtain funding for this school instead of worrying about how to get rid of the harmless mascot. Unfortunately, the only thing that we will gain from this complaint about the mascot is more wrongful negative publicity.

Joeseph W. Schmidt
Amherst

UMass has 'perverse values'

The Boston Globe highlighted the perverse set of values exhibited by the so-called activist community on this campus. One news story recognized the greatest research achievements conducted at UMass. The other story examined the latest political movement on campus. There is a sad connection between these two events. The Nobel winners left the University during a time of budget cutbacks and now Princeton can lay claim to the phrase "Nobel Prize winning faculty members" not UMass. While the university experienced a brain drain of faculty members, while the Federal government continually tightened and cut student financial aid, while regular tuition increases denied access to UMass for the financially needy, the political "activists" on this campus fiddled with issues like coed bathrooms, offensive magazines, mascots and other drool.

Kevin Bowe

Why not a box of crayons?

I think that the University should adopt a box of crayons as its mascot for two reasons: First, all of the colors are included in a box of crayons; second, most people associate crayons with childhood, a time in everyone's life that can be considered pre-racist. I mean, how can you dislike crayons? Actually, the radical feminist ideologist might dislike their phallic design. If that is the case, then dump the crayons out on a tray and stick them in the oven. All of the crayons will blend into colorful mass that is ultimately inoffensive.

Abortion shouldn't be feminist issue

The abortion industry oppresses women — and people either do not hear about it or choose to ignore it.

There are six techniques used for inducing abortion. Each is dangerous and can, and do, have many negative side-effects. Risks range from hemorrhaging to intense bleeding to death.

One doctor explains, "The Abortion Surveillance Branch of the Center for Disease Control claims that induced abortion is a safe backup for contraception failure. Massive under reporting of complications and even deaths...refute this claim."

The psychological complications of abortion are also great. Researchers have concluded that many women who have had abortions suffer from Post Abortion Syndrome (PAS).

Diana
D'AVANZO

Women who suffer from PAS may experience attempted suicide, drug and alcohol abuse, relationship disorders, repeated abortions and damaged self-esteem. PAS is characterized by a period of "denial" which "may last five to ten years before emotional difficulties surface."

However, pro-abortion enthusiasts will argue that abortion is a needed measure because of poverty, unwanted children and rape. Though this sounds logical and compassionate, the argument is misguided.

We are told that abortion is necessary for poor single women. When forced to feed another mouth, she will never be able to progress and even resent this "unwanted" child.

The view that the poor are unable to sacrifice and care for a child is ridiculous. I wonder how many students here at UMass come from large, underclass families? True, it may have been tough, but it was and is possible. Should we judge someone's survival before even giving the chance?

Also, the study done by Dr. Edward Lenoski, Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Southern California, is very interesting. Of 674 battered and abused children, 91% were planned. The unwanted child theory is a myth. Thousands of couples are waiting to adopt a child. Were a woman to give up her child, someone would be there to care for him or her.

Many argue that, in the traumatic case of rape, abortion is a must. It should be noted that rape practically never results in pregnancy. In fact according to Dr. J.C. Wilkes in the book "Abortion: Questions and Answers", only 1 out of every 25,000 abortions is performed because of rape.

Then what about that 2%?

Why not look at first hand accounts? Kay Zibolsky was raped at 16 and, as a result, pregnant. Kay reveals "...I can live with the fact that I've been raped, but I couldn't live in peace if I had killed my child." Kay later gave her daughter up for adoption and today has no regrets.

Jackie Bakker was raped at knife point when she was 19. Jackie tells of the emotional anguish that her abortion caused, "I felt an emptiness that nothing could fill, and quickly discovered that the aftermath of abortion continued long after the memory of the rape had dimmed."

After rape, abortion is not the "only logical" avenue.

A pro-abortion stand damages the women's movement. The argument is that if abortion is fully a woman's choice then men can logically conclude that the decision to raise a child is a woman's responsibility alone. Men are thus freed of all obligations and given access to "responsibility-free" sex.

Rather than work at changing our society into one that educates women about the negative effects and trauma of abortion and offers support and guidance for single mother's, our government would rather get rid of any responsibility and keep women poor and in pain.

Organizations such as Students for Life and Responsible Choices and Feminists for Life recognize the full implications that abortion has in society. Others, such as Women Exploited by Abortion and (Northampton's very own) Alternatives, offer information and support for women faced with a crisis pregnancy. Abortion is not the best choice.

AIDS money

This country's funding of AIDS is an absolute joke. We're spending way too much for what is essentialiy a lost cause.

In the beginning, more than a decade ago, there were a small number of homosexual men suffering from a rare condition that doctors could not diagnose.

After this community of homosexuals began dropping like flies with no explanation, doctors and researchers began to search for the clues. They came up with human immunodeficiency virus, HIV for short.

The wonderful people at the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta finally figured out that the horrible deaths were caused by a lack of T-cells, which are in the bloodstream to fight disease. With the immune system down, these first deaths were caused by illnesses that normally would be stopped.

Soon, the virus was passed to intravenous drug users, who would shoot up with filthy needles, with no care for their health. The druggies soon followed the homosexuals to the coffin with AIDS-related illnesses.

And then, the virus crossed over — to heterosexuals. To blood transfusion recipients. To babies.

When it first hit the mainstream, people were ignorant of AIDS. And with good reason; most people don't hear about freak deaths of society's fringe unless they hang out on city street corners at night.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Eventually, people began to listen. A president funded the disease. Charities were set up to fund AIDS research. This was simply the right thing to do.

Today, AIDS is blown out of proportion. More money is wasted on AIDS then on almost any other disease and a Democratic president may incorporate AIDS into a national health plan, costing businesses and taxpayers millions.

And still, most of the carriers of the disease were infected because of lifestyle. Why should we pay to heal someone who chooses to be in a high-risk category? Why should we pay to find a cure for someone who will continue to inject drugs into their system with dirty needles?

We shouldn't. We've paid too much already. Homosexuals choose their lifestyle, they choose to engage in sodomy, the activity with the highest risk.

How difficult is it to just stop? When they know the people they hang around with are either carriers of AIDS or have been exposed, why do people continue to engage in this dangerous activity?

Those who say that AIDS is now a heterosexual disease are wrong — dead wrong. AIDS is, has been and always will be mainly a homosexual and drug user disease. It was started in this circle and is still perpetuated.

A Reader's Digest article from May 93 said only three percent of men received the virus from heterosexual sex. Blood transfusions accounted for 2.3 percent of all carriers, and that number is going down. What does that leave? Add it up, folks.

Our economy is in a fragile position, placed even more so because of the new administration. We cannot afford to keep throwing money in a bottomless pit. The amount of money we give to companies for new products to fight AIDS is exorbitant.

It is definitely the wrong direction. AIDS is only the ninth-leading cause of deaths for Americans, and they spent twice as much as they did for heart disease, which was the number one killer, reported the Digest.

With health reform on the way, we must come up with a solution to this question: Do we continue to waste money on a disease that affects people with dangerous lifestyles? Or do we look away, do what we can to make the disease less painful, and move on for a cheaper alternative, like a vaccine, for instance.

My answer may sound cold, but we must do the best for the majority of Americans.

Stop selling porn

I was very disappointed to see the ad from Anthony's in yesterday's paper, featuring "Penthouse Pet Raquel Darian." Too many studies have linked pornography use to an increased tolerance of violence against women. Such objectification is certainly sexist.

I've heard the arguments that women freely choose to participate in pornography, but I question the values of a society where a woman's choice to participate in their own objectification is often more valued and makes them more money than if they use their intelligence and power.

I would hope that the Collegian wouldn't publish an ad that promotes racism or any other oppression. Is sexism the exception? Is sexism still OK? Many publications have policies to not run "adult entertainment" ads and I hope the Collegian will join them.

whether or not he could make a monetary promise without consulting the board. He said there was no need to pass it through the BOG," said Susan Bourque, director of the Craft Center.

"The board is anxious to clear up any funding discrepancies from previous years," said Fitzgerald.

According to Fitzgerald, funding to the Craft Center decreased because of cuts from the Student Activities Trust Fund, and stated he had no written knowledge of the missing money.

"Until the board receives written verification that indicates there was a commitment by the former chair to allocate the Craft Shop $2,700, the full board will not take up the matter," said Fitzgerald.

"I would like to join with the Board to have this work as a team effort," said Bourque.

by without her doing much to gain insight into the universal voice among her children, the voice that propelled their play, talk, stories and eventually their self-endowed "right to exclude."

"I had been asleep in and out of the classroom," Paley said. "I went along without asking many questions of my own. But now I was waking up."

Being told he or she can't play is the cruellest thing a child can hear, she said.

"How casually a child can devastate another," Paley said.

One child told her that exclusion was going to happen in life anyway, so the ones being left out should get used to it.

After challenging this notion and conducting a test of sorts, where a child was alone in a room with another child who she and others had consistently barred from participating in their games, discovered that the habit of exclusion and not the identity of those being shunned is the problem.

The children pretended they were in a magical golden castle and the girl who had excluded the other girl readily involved her in "hiding from the dragon that was coming to get them."

"We're all in our own magical castle," Paley said, expressing that her idea works for a classroom or a whole school. "It's easier to open the doors than to keep others out."

Lost in Yonkers to begin run at F.A.C.

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

In matters both public and private, Neil Simon is a shy man. Hesitant and quiet, with sad eyes and a sad smile, he seems almost incapable of being the person responsible for some of the most insane, frenetic comedies of our time.

In shows from The Odd Couple to The Goodbye Girl, his characters are manic reflections of everything the playwright himself is not. But watching the 1991 Pulitzer Play Lost In Yonkers (to be performed this weekend at the Fine Arts Center) one cannot help but feel the presence of the real Neil Simon.

Lost In Yonkers is a dysfunctional family show, set in the pastel cell which is Grandma Kurnitz's Candy Shop, in 1950's New York. The eponymous owner of this shop is a gargoyle — a woman so daunting in appearance and disposition that even her own children cease breathing when she is near. She is an immigrant and self-made success, survivor of riots and persecution, who believes in verbal lashings as an alternative to affection.

Her offspring are suitably twisted. Louis is a small-time hood who rebels against Grandma's control by breaking every law he can find. Bella is a simpleton, who has allowed her spirit (and mind) to be crushed by coldness, and still lives at home in scared silence.

We see this gallery through the eyes of two young boys; Kurnitz's grandchildren, who are deposited in her care while their father crosses the country hawking aluminum siding. One is a mischievous cherub, with a spirit that Grandma must almost admire. But it is the older, more withdrawn child that draws our attention. He suggests, to those who know him, a portrait of the young Neil Simon.

Growing up in the still, civil world of the Candy Shop is a life-defining experience for this boy, unaccustomed to the tension which surrounds him. He is the only one who seems to understand that he and his allies under the whip of Grandma Kurnitz are sharing a search for meaning, and for a separate peace that most of them will never find.

Yet there are moments, in this story, of rich and satisfying comedy. When the quiet boy with the quick wit, who is never allowed to speak, lets loose in an inspired parody of his family, Simon himself seems to shine through. But as much as the playwright reveals and accuses his characters, in those lighter moments when their self-conceptions fold around them, he never loses the feel of tolerant good humor. In some measure, this is his own life onstage — and though the memories are rueful, the satire is gentle and affectionate.

The results share much the same poignancy as Simon's BB Trilogy, but little of the serenity. This is a comedy of the past in which lives are revisited, tinged with a drama of regret in which lives are unfulfilled. It is real, and that is what makes it soar.

Lost In Yonkers won the 1991 Tony and Pulitzer Prizes for Drama. The National Company will perform the play on Saturday Oct. 16 at 8 p.m. and Sunday Oct. 17 at 2 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are available from the Fine Arts Center Box Office, or by phone at 545-3671. Advance reservation is recommended.

Foliage is on display

DANA L. FORRAR
Collegian Staff

Jack Kerouac once said: "The road must eventually lead to the whole world. . . ain't nowhere else it can go - right?"

Every year about this time, people from New York City, Hartford and Boston make the trek to get away from the subway and panhandling, and break for New Hampshire, Vermont and the Berkshires to enjoy nature's curtain call.

ON THE ROAD by Dana Forrar

These foliage freaks will go to any lengths to witness the glorious spectacle of color and splendor amidst baseball playoffs and Halloween costume hunting. For those of us engrossed in study, we can take a lesson from these leaf-lookers and take a break to restore our smiles and rest our minds so we won't completely "lose it" come finals week.

The Berkshires aren't too far from us and the Mass. Turnpike (Route 90) is a convenient way there. If you make Pittsfield your destination, you can go on a historic sight-seeing trek as well. Take exit two to go to the Norman Rockwell Museum at Stockbridge. The hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Also in the Berkshires is Herman Melville's home and one of the oldest still working farms that is a part of an entire Shaker community, called the Hancock Shaker Village. The number for directions and features is 443-0188.

Then there is my personal favorite destination, Cornish, New Hampshire. To get there take Route 91 north into Vermont to exit 8. Follow Route 5 north into Windsor until you reach the covered bridge (more pictures) where you take a right and follow into Cornish. This trip in itself is less than an hour of trees turning their yellows, oranges and fiery reds, certainly picturebook landscapes.

Once in Cornish, you can search for the Greta Garbo of print, J.D. Salinger, who has been a hermit there for over thirty years. If you find him, call me. The other main attraction is the Saint-Gaudens National Historic Site. This highlights the works and sculptures of Augustin Saint-Gaudens, and is open 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. for only two dollars.

"O hushed October mild/Thy leaves have ripened to the fall/Tomorrow's wind if, it be wild/Should waste them all." Robert Frost country is ripe for the foliage takers, a getaway not soon forgotten. Pack a lunch. Bring a camera. Get away.

Please send trip suggestions for future columns to Dana Forrar at 113 Campus Center.

Bash to help shelter

By BILL LABERIS
Collegian Correspondent

On Saturday, Oct. 16, the Young Men's Club in Hadley will host "Zoo Bash," an all day festival of music, dance, sports and food. The event is designed to act as a benefit for the Massachusetts Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Springfield Shelter.

The idea behind "Zoo Bash" was to create an all-day event that would cater to music fans as well as animal lovers. "Zoo Bash" will be "music for animals," said event co-coordinator Chris Potter.

Three musical acts have been booked for the event so that there will be live music virtually all day. Local favorites Settie and Tainted Bitter Band are both slated to perform. In addition to local talent, a Boston-based band named Explosion will also be performing.

Aside from the musical entertainment, Zoo Bash plans to cater to the sports lover by offering organized games and matches of volleyball, basketball, frisbee, horseshoes and softball (players should bring gloves).

There will be no shortage of food at the festival either. An all-day barbecue will keep the music and sports lovers full of hot dogs and hamburgers. A cash bar will also be open.

Potter feels that the grounds on which Zoo Bash is to be held are extremely favorable to the event. With a pavilion containing 15-20 large picnic tables and a capacity of between 150 and 200 people, the Young Men's Club is an ideal location for the event.

While "Zoo Bash's" ultimate goal is to raise money for the MSPCA Springfield Shelter to help animals who are in need of shelter and love, Potter hopes "Zoo Bash" will be a "full day of fun and entertainment to get people together."

Tickets are available at Tix Unlimited in the UMass Student Union for $6. That price covers admission for the entire noon - 6 p.m. duration. The Young Men's Club is located on East Street in Hadley, just off of Route 9.

Author's first effort embraces controversy

By EDWARD HURLEY
Collegian Correspondent

She Needed Me
Walter Kirn
Published by Pocket Books

She Needed Me is Walter Kirn's first novel. It's the story of Weaver Walquist, an ex-drug abuser turned born-again Christian, who meets a young woman named Kim while protesting at an abortion clinic with his radical Christian protest group. Kim is at the clinic to have an abortion, but is scared away by Walquist and his cohorts.

Through a strange twist of fate Weaver and Kim eventually became friends, yet the stubborn Weaver continues to subtly persuade her not to get an abortion. He takes Kim to her parents' house in North Dakota, perhaps to instill some of his family's values into what he considered a misguided woman. However, he slowly looses faith in God as he falls deeply in love with Kim. They eventually let love erase all of the political and social lines between them, and live happily ever after.

That is basically the story - virtually a few incidents held together by narration. The idea of a very religious man becoming involved with a abortion-seeking female has possibilities. Unfortunately, Kirn doesn't handle it as well as he could have.

From the beginning, the story is flawed. First of all, Weaver's militant anti-abortion group seems dubious in its intentions. The group's leader, Lucas lives in his car, pops Prozacs like candy and is paranoid that someone is following him. Finally, Weaver's faith is somewhat discredited by the fact that he was a drug abuser, but Lucas "saves" him and helps him to be "born again." He switches from dope to divinity, trading one addiction for another. it was pretty predictable that Weaver would forsake his newly acquired religious beliefs for Kim.

The book goes on until you notice you have only a few pages left and nothing has really happened. There is an attempt to have a tension-filled climate that just falls flat. The ending isn't quite as predictable as the rest of the book, but it's by no means earth-shattering. The story is bland, and you really don't feel for, identify with or really even like the characters. They don't seem real or believable; they are as two-dimensional as the print on the page.

Kirn tries to unite two unlikely people, their relationship complicated by religious ideals and opinions on abortion. Somehow, the story doesn't work.

If you want to read a book about two people who do connect despite that they are from different worlds, I suggest reading Robert Waller's The Bridges of Madison County. It's Waller's first novel; a wonderfully rich story, full of real characters.

It's unfortunate that Kirn's first novel couldn't be as great as Waller's, but, in all fairness, She Needed Me was a good attempt at writing about a complicated subject that feeds the coals of the fire of the controversy over a woman's reproductive rights that pervades our society today.

U.N. group leaves Haiti

Violence and assassinations follow

By ED McCULLOUGH
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — A U.N. police team pulled out of Haiti Thursday, weakening the prospects for ousted President Jean Bertrand Aristide's return by Oct. 30 under a U.N. plan. Within hours, gunmen assassinated the pro Aristide justice minister.

Guy Malary was part of the transitional government installed on Sept. 2 to pave the way for Aristide's return, who was ousted in a September 1991 military coup.

Radio Metropol reported Malary was leaving the Justice Ministry building in his car when gunmen in another car shot him. A driver and two security guards also were killed in a hail of bullets, Metropol director Richard Widmeier said.

Malary had received death threats since joining the administration, said Ira Kurzban, a friend and lawyer in Miami who specializes in Haitian issues. He said Malary handled court work for the U.S. Embassy in Haiti.

Malary was not previously associated with Aristide, and Kurzban said he believed the killing "shows that no one is safe."

Malary, a corporate lawyer in his 30s, attended Georgetown and Howard universities in Washington.

The assassination occurred shortly after noon. In the morning, 51 Canadian Mounties flew home in a clear sign that a U.N. brokered plan to restore democracy was foundering.

what NBC thinks. I made the name up.

Speaking of the Patriots, they finally won. Hip hop hooray. What surprised me is that the Patsies pulled a victory out of the claws of defeat: thanks to that lateral they won a game they had no business of winning.

How about that Pat Harlow goof making a comment in the locker room like, "I knew we were going to score, but then I thought, 'we can't win, we're the Patriots?'"

Talk about instilling a winning attitude, huh?

No matter. New England entertains *Los*eton and Coach Pardee in a sell-out at Foxboro this Sunday. Pardee won't have a job much longer if continues to pull stunts like benching Warren Moon. Two in a row? Secules over Carlson in a barnburner, New England 17, Houston 16.

In a rematch of the best game of last season, the San Francisco 49ers travel to Texas Stadium to take on the defending Super Bowl Champions. Don't look now, and I hate to say I told ya so, but the Cowboys are ready to roll.

With Dan Marino going out last week-end against the Browns, Troy Aikman is by far the best QB playing the game. Michael Irvin is putting up better numbers than Mr. Rice thus far, and guess who's back running all over the place.

But as we know, offense can't win you everything. It only sells tickets, right?

Wrong. Consistently, the teams with great defense rely on turnovers to produce points. The main reason is they don't have any one on offense to score the points [see New Orleans and San Diego].

These two teams that were in the NFC Championship Game last year have offense. And lots of it. I said two things earlier in the season and told you to bank on it; I'll retract one.

Miami has no shot at the Bowl without Marino — they won't score without him. However, when I said that Dallas would not lose another game all season, I meant it. The Niners will be running to Kansas City to find Joe, because they have no shot in the place where God is always watching. Dallas 34, San Francisco 17.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An older person really does mean well. Make allowances. Rearrange office furniture for maximum comfort and efficiency. Jot down any money-making ideas that could come in handy later on.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Work conditions are gradually improving. Do not expect too much too soon. A meaningful romance fills you with joy. Your social plans may change at the last minute. Be flexible.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The emphasis today is on protecting your financial security. Avoid taking any unnecessary risks. Go slow where your love life is concerned.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You could feel indecisive or pressured this morning. Why force the pace? Let your associates know that you will act when the time is right. Your intuition is reliable in family affairs.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Now that you can almost taste the success, you pick up a real bargain or gain an important ally. A true meeting of minds is possible. Buy books and art supplies.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The financial picture brightens if you continue to keep the lid on spending. Family members approve of a romantic commitment.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your career prospects improve, thanks to a lucky break. People who have opposed you in the past want to jump on your bandwagon.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): The emphasis now is on developing an enduring relationship with an attractive member of the opposite sex. Diplomacy is your best ally in business negotiations.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You cannot afford to risk your money, not even for the sake of friendship. New employment gains for ahead; you find yourself whistling while you work.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Cultivating an unusual relationship could yield surprising rewards. Something that falls into your lap should be a real blessing. Creativity pays big dividends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Career advancement is a top priority now. Reward gains come through publicity and advertising. Romance could take an upward turn. Give a loved one a second chance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Think twice before you speak and look before you leap. In short, take the precautions any sensible person would to prevent errors and losses. When you voice your views with authority, others listen.

Water polo comes home looking for success

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

They're pumped, and they have good reason to be.

After playing 13 games on the road, the University of Massachusetts water polo team will bring its electrifying, high-powered act to Amherst College this weekend for the New England Division Championships.

UMass (10-3) opens up against Boston College (11:00 a.m.), Harvard (4:00 p.m.) and Brown (7:00 p.m.) on Saturday, and faces Iona (10:15 a.m.) on Sunday.

Head Coach Russ Yarworth said the level of competition is just what his team needs.

"We need to play some tough teams," he said. "The back-to-back games between Harvard and Brown will test our strength."

The Minutemen are coming off a 19-15 victory over Harvard this past Friday, but Yarworth was not pleased with the quality of the team defense.

"We were just satisfied to win the game," he said. "We weren't satisfied to do what we have to do to win a championship. I'm concerned that we haven't made the commitment as a team.

"That's what I'm looking for this weekend. If we don't make the commitment then it's going to be a tough season for us."

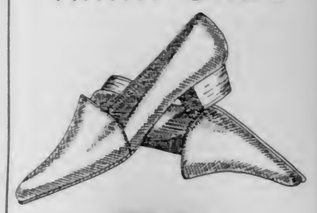
The weekend will test the mettle of this squad, ranked No. 15 in the nation. Brown, ranked No. 13, is coming off a huge upset of highly-touted Long Beach State this past weekend.

"You have to answer the challenge," said Yarworth. "If you can't answer it, then you don't belong there."

Putting in nearly 15 hours a week in practice time, the squad is excited to showcase its abilities in front of its home fans.

"It's fun to play at home," said Yarworth. "[The fans] can expect an exciting team that is ready to put on a show. They want to show why they are ranked in the Top 20 in the country. And that's what it's all about."

While the starting seven are set, Yarworth is just as confident with his players off the bench.



"I'm pleased with the progress of John Luviano," he said. "He's one of the first guys off the bench, and he's coming along nicely. He plays good defense and that is what I need.

"The other guy that is really stepping up into a leadership role is Luke Harlan," Yarworth said. "He could very well be starting, but I decided to bring him off the bench. He's really made the commitment of improving his individual defense."

"The starters are only as important as the subs, and the subs are only as important as the starters. It's a team effort."

This weekend, that team effort comes to Amherst College, and it should prove to be very entertaining.

favorably to running up front."

The Eastern Conference meet is a mid-season tune-up that has featured the likes of Maine, the University of Vermont, and the University of New Hampshire in the past.

"The Eastern Conference meet is a solid cross country meet," O'Brien said. "It's good varsity competition."

The UMass squad will be made up of underclassmen led by sophomore Rick Copley, who was the team's top finisher last year placing 17th. O'Brien is expecting much of the same from Copley this year.

"Of the group we're bringing down, he's the highest ranked up to this point," he said.

O'Brien also said he wouldn't be surprised to see his freshmen group running with the sophomores.

"They've really shown rapid improvement over the last few weeks," he said.

O'Brien expects his team, with the different role, to adjust their usual race plan. He said he anticipates the team will react to the race and take it to the next level.

"This is a chance to develop our role players at the maximum level of experience," he said.

O'Brien said with the new role he is looking for improvement out of the team.

"I'm looking for people to challenge for starting positions," O'Brien said.

NCAA moves up hoops practice date

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

The date for men's college basketball teams to officially begin practice has been changed by the NCAA to Oct. 30, instead of Nov. 1, this season, according to Dan Dutcher, the NCAA Director of Legislative Services.

Switching days moves the annual Midnight Madness for the squads this year to the night/morning of Friday, Oct. 29.

Last Tuesday, the NCAA counsel committee approved a non-controversial legislative amendment to allow programs to start practice on the Saturday before Nov. 1 if the first falls on either a Sunday or Monday.

The amendment was approved by the committee only for Divisions I and II.

Dutcher said the initial request for the change came from the National Association of Basketball Coaches, in order to help the athletes academically.

"The coaches originally said that by allowing the teams to practice on a Saturday instead of a Monday, it would prevent a conflict with the student's classes," said Dutcher.

According to Dutcher, the coaches also felt that they could now have an extra day off to give to the players, helping them keep up with the academic workload.

University of Massachusetts Men's Basketball Assistant Coach John Robic said that for the Minutemen, the move of the first day of practice can only be beneficial.

"Now, with no classes on Saturday, it makes it easier for the team to get going," said Robic. "Instead of having 14 practices before our first game [against Cleveland State on Nov. 18], we now have 16."

Robic said despite the move of the Madness festivities from Sunday night to Friday, the event with the University of North Carolina and the University of Kentucky televised by ESPN will remain intact.

The doors will open at 11 p.m. on Friday, and ESPN will begin broadcasting live at midnight and continue split coverage of the three schools until 1 a.m.

Sophomore cornerback Breon Parker, Sports Illustrated's Defensive Player of the Week, leads the Minutemen as they go against the UConn Huskies this weekend in Storrs, Conn.

Parker garners major honors

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

"Massachusetts cornerback Breon Parker, a sophomore, had seven tackles and three interceptions, one of which he returned for a TD, in a 36-14 win over Rhode Island."

The October 18, 1993 issue of Sports Illustrated will be long remembered by most people as the issue covering Michael Jordan's retirement, but Breon Parker will remember the above paragraph as one of the crowning achievements in his football career.

Parker was named SI's Defensive Player of the Week in the issue that hit newsstands on Wednesday.

"It's still a shock," he said. "I'm still trying to figure out how I feel. The prestige behind Sports Illustrated, I didn't even know you could get [the award] in Division I-AA."

The award capped a wild week in which the transfer from Nassau Community College received every major honor there was. He was the Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Week, the ECAC Defensive Player of the Week, the Coca-Cola Gold Helmet Award Winner and The Sports Network I-AA Defensive Player of the Week.

"It feels great, it really does," Parker said. "But I have to put it behind me and get ready for the next game."

The Minutemen (3-2, 1-2 in the YanCon) face a daunting task as they head to Storrs, Conn., to face the UConn Huskies for that team's Homecoming. UMass is 0-2 on the road this season, and has performed poorly in two losses to Maine and Boston University. Parker has already become something as a leader, and he said the team cannot let down again.

Parker has only been at UMass for five games, but he's already a leader. The benefits of transferring last spring and going out for spring practice really paid off, according to defensive coordinator Bill McGovern.

"[Linebackers coach] Jerry Azzinaro recruited him, and he was able to learn the schemes during the spring, which helped him a lot," McGovern said. "There's an awareness he has which he wouldn't have if he came in now."

"I don't think without spring practice I would've come on as fast as I did," Parker said. "It really helped me."

With every spectacular week Parker has, the memory of All-America cornerback Don Caparotti fades a little more. A weakness UMass suspected to have in the secondary has turned into a strength, thanks in part to Parker.

"They didn't really talk that much about him," Parker said, referring to Caparotti. "I knew there was a huge hole to fill, and they told me I have a chance to be a star."

Game Notes: The game can be heard on WTTT 1430 AM with Mike Fagerson and Jim Degnim.

Myers at home in Mass

Freshman makes move north with ease

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Besides having to sit next to, of all things, a Phillies' fan while watching her Braves take it on the chin and the fact the weather gets a little colder than she expected, Rebecca Myers' journey from Marietta, Ga., to Amherst, Ma., has been a fairly smooth one.

Especially on the soccer field, where the freshman stopper is playing with the confidence and skill of a fifth year senior.

Myers, with six goals and five assists, is the No. 7 Massachusetts' (10-2-1) second leading scorer and is currently the leading candidate to be named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year. Not bad for a kid who did not think she would see much action her freshman season.

"I wasn't even expecting to play," Myers said. "But it has worked out well. My teammates have helped make the adjustment from high school and club soccer to college soccer an easy one."

UMass Coach Jim Rudy said, "Rebecca, along with (fellow freshman) Erin Lynch have been terrific. Neither have played like freshmen. It's nice when you throw two young kids into the back of your defense and they start pitching shutouts."

Myers has had to assume a greater defensive responsibility this season due to injuries to Lynch and senior sweeper Paula Wilkins. Myers normally would play midfield, a position she says she is more comfortable at.

"I like making offensive runs and getting into the play," Myers said. "But as long as I'm playing, I don't care where I am on the field."

Wilkins, a Pennsylvania native and Phillie fan, made sure to give Myers a hard time during the baseball playoffs, but Myers forgives her.

"Paula really rubbed it in," Myers said. "I wish I was in Atlanta for that but I really like it up here, my teammates have made leaving the South a lot easier."

The Minutewomen will host Atlantic 10 foes George Washington (noon on Saturday) and St. Bonaventure (1 p.m. on Sunday) this weekend.

Tennis loses to Bates

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team evened its record at 2-2 Wednesday when it was taken apart by Bates College on the Lewiston, Maine campus' indoor courts. The Minutemen were swept in doubles competition for the second straight outing and won just one of six singles matches.

"I think we'd all rather forget about this match," Joe Twer said. Twer lost the sixth singles match, 6-4, 6-1, to Matt Rein and is still searching for his first victory in that position.

UMass enjoyed modest success at the highest level by virtue of Kasper Vaala's defeat of Jeff Poleshek in the first singles match, 7-5, 6-4. The Danish import's record improved to 4-0 for the season.

Ankur Baishya, coming off his first victory of the year against Vermont, couldn't duplicate the feat as he fell to Mark Erelli, 6-2, 6-2, in second singles.

"I have some kinks to work out of my game," Baishya said.

Keith Murray continues to struggle in third singles. He fought his way into a first set tie breaker with Dylan Stearns, but he lost it, 7-3, and the match, 7-6, 6-2.

"I have a lot to work on," Murray said.

UMass appears to have found a winning combination in Vaala and Dave Bradley, the Amherst High product who were coached by Judy Dixon. The number one doubles tandem lost, but the chemistry is present.

"We hit it off immediately way back when practice was beginning," Bradley said, though he had little to say about his 6-4, 6-3 loss in fourth singles to Jackson Marvel.

"I plead the Fifth," Bradley said.

In the other doubles contests, Baishya and Murray lost to Poleshek and Jeff Zink, 8-4, while Marvel and Fred Goldman proved to be too much for Sasha Bluestone and Kevin Hicks, 8-3 losers.

Bill Bochnak lost to Zink, 6-3, 6-3 in fifth singles.

Men's cross country prepares for EC meet

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

Coming off an impressive race at last weekend's Paul Short Invitational, the University of Massachusetts men's cross country heads to New Britain, Conn., for the 1993 Eastern Conference meet.

With the Atlantic 10 Championships just a week away, Head Coach Ken O'Brien said he will rest his top group of runners and give his younger runners a chance to step into the spotlight.

"This meet is good varsity competition," he said. "It's a chance to gain championship meet experience."

O'Brien said the meet allows the runners to experience running in a varsity front-running capacity.

"They're used to a support role," he said. "Hopefully they'll respond

Pond recieves cleaning

Group's efforts beautify the campus

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Wondering what that stench in the air was this Saturday? Thanks to a couple of hard-working University of Massachusetts students and physical plant workers, the Campus Pond was drained and cleaned out.

The cleanup, beginning at 9 a.m. Saturday morning and finishing at 3 p.m., uncovered many treasures for the excavators. According to Ramin Pourali, vice-president and co-founder of SETA, the workers found chairs, bottles, shoes, videotapes, dolls and golf balls to name a few.

"I plead the Fifth," Bradley said.

One surprise for the day was a crayfish trap full of crabs, crayfish and fish. With quick thinking and a pair of sharp metal clippers, all were rescued and thrown back into deeper water.

"It's just dirty and gross," said Marin McKenney, president of Club Communications, of the cleanup. McKenney, donning hip boots and getting stuck in the mud, said he could not believe how much the pond smelled.

Along with the eight students volunteers were four Physical Plant employees that gave up their own time to come and supervise.

"If it wasn't because of them we couldn't of done this. I appreciate them 110 percent," said Pourali of the supervisors.

"Yeah, those guys were great. They make you feel like you're right in with them," replied Kyle Fuller, a UMass student and SETA member.

While students were collecting garbage at one end, physical plant workers were bulldozing six trucks full with dirt from the "dead end" of the Pond. According to Pourali, one of the workers told him that the end of the Campus Pond by the Fine Arts Center, used to be fourteen feet deep.

Gov. Weld, alumni enter mascot melee

By TRACY MONAHAN
and DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

Discussion on the issue of the "Minuteman" logo continued despite a statement issued Friday afternoon by Chancellor David K. Scott saying there would be no formal debate on the issue.

"The second shot heard round the world apparently was fired when I said I would listen to and talk with students about the Minuteman mascot," Scott said in the statement.

Just hours before Scott released his statement, Gov. William Weld said the issue was an example of "political correctness run amok." That same day, a group calling itself "University of Massachusetts Alumni and Students to Save the Minutemen" released a statement proclaiming support for the beleaguered mascot.

Weld said the attack on the logo was like "saying the Baltimore Orioles offend sparrows and the New York Giants demean short people."

Weld also told the Boston Herald that he believes it is fine to question authority, but the Minuteman Issue is "ridiculous."

"Because of the misunderstandings and misperceptions around the Minuteman debate, it would be virtually impossible to discuss any ideas on this subject in a way that would be productive," Scott said.

He also said he welcomes opinions on the mascot but said he will not authorize any formal change in the team mascot.

Scott, who is of Scottish descent, said his willingness to discuss the issues has been misinterpreted by those who say he does not value the historical importance of the Minuteman.

"I have the highest admiration for the valor of the Minuteman and their enormous contributions to Massachusetts and this nation," Scott said.

The University of Massachusetts Alumni and Students to Save the Minuteman said Scott was unfamiliar with the history of the state and the University and they believe he is alienating the majority of the students who do not wish to see the logo changed.

The furor came about last week as a result of a petition backed by the American Freedom Foundation and the Radical Student Union. The petition calls for increased ALANA recruitment, increased financial aid for economically disadvantaged students, renaming the tower library to the W.E.B. DuBois Library, and changing the mascot because the groups deem it to be racist and sexist.

A rally, advertising the issue of the logo change, was also held last week and was attended by about 30 students.

Martin Jones, president of the AFF, said he plans to hold a press conference today at 11 a.m. on the Campus Center Concourse.

Mullins Center to close when wind in area exceeds 55 mph

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials have volunteered to close the Mullins Center if winds exceed 55 miles per hour, in compliance with the request of the Massachusetts Board of Building Regulations and Standards, Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance Paul Page said.

The recommendation was made as a result of the report issued by Zallen Engineering Inc. which said the facility could be damaged by winds of 55 mph or a moderate "design" earthquake of six or seven on the Richter scale.

A comprehensive study of the construction and design of the Mullins Center should be completed by the end of the week, Page said.

The study, which is being done by the engineering company Simpson, Grumpertz and Breger, are looking at the design of the Mullins center now, Page said. The company has already reached the conclusion that the Mullins Center roof would not collapse in winds of 55 miles per hour.

"Winds of 55 miles per hour could put some stresses on the structural supports of the facility," Page said. "But it would not lead to the collapse of the roof."

The Sunday Republican reported that state inspectors never inspected the Mullins Center for hurricane or earthquake safety. The $50 million facility was inspected by private contractors Weidlinger Associates of Cambridge, but the inspection of the design was done before the construction took place.

The arena was also checked by private state inspectors, but the inspectors had little knowledge of hurricane or earthquake safety. The Department of Public Saftey did not inspect the construction because they are understaffed and do

Jane Doe Walk raises money for women's safety

By JOHN CURRAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — About 4,000 people endured rainy weather and some painful personal memories Sunday in a walk to raise money for battered women's shelters throughout Massachusetts.

The second annual Jane Doe Walk For Women's Safety raised nearly $350,000 which will go to the 30 shelters throughout the state to help finance operations and to pay for women who need taxi fare, overnight operations or money to have their locks changed, Stiles said.

"What we need to caution people about is that a woman is most at risk when she attempts to leave," Stile said.

Sunday's event followed another recent incident of domestic violence, in which a woman was repeatedly stabbed and hit with a hammer at a Weymouth apartment. The victim had taken out a restraining order against her boyfriend, who was charged in the attack.

Many in the crowd Sunday stood watching tearfully during opening ceremonies as Jane Doe Safety Fund Executive Director Carolyn Ramsey called the manes of 32 domestic violence victims killed in Massachusetts this year.

For each, a person walked onto the stage a the Hatch Shell carrying a placard with the victim's name, age, hometown, and date of death.

As she waited to go on stage, Jacqueline Fernandez, 19, of Springfield fought back tears.

Her placard was for Elizabeth Delgado, 19, who was shot to death by her boyfriend last June in Springfield. In one hand, she held the placard. In the other, a snapshot of her and Delgado.

"We were best friends," said Fernandez, who knew Delgado since they were in eighth grade.

Fernandez held back a sob, then said, "I didn't think I was going to be like this."

Some walkers didn't even know their victims.

A 24-year old woman from Winchester who pushed her 2 year old daughter in a stroller carried a placard for Sandra Calo, 24, of Somerville, who died last August.

"Who was she to you?" the woman was asked.

"Nobody. She just didn't have anybody to walk for her. She's the same age as I am," said the woman, who wouldn't identify herself.

Part of SETA's long-term goals is to try and provide a pump of some sort to keep the water flowing in order keep the Pond cleaner.

SETA is a UMass student group that represents the Middle Eastern students on campus. The group came up with the idea of the cleanup at a meeting about a month ago because they were tired of the bad smell and felt that some action needed to be taken.

After approval from UMass Chancellor David K. Scott, Thomas Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs and Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance, the group went into action to promote the cleanup and recruit other student organizations.

Democrats on campus set to back Roosevelt

By JAMIE D. BEARSE
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — "Hey, Hey, Ho, Ho Bill Weld has got to go," the University Democrats chanted as they marched up Main Street, Worcester, campaigning for the Democratic State Platform Convention this past weekend.

The convention, which centered around putting a Democratic governor back into the state house, had 27 college Democratic members from UMass joined with 31 more from the other institutions in the five-college-system backing State Senator Mark Roosevelt.

"We met him last spring and seems like he cares a great deal about us," said University Democrats Vice-President Carrie Skinner.

"We already have a campaign head quarters on campus for Roosevelt, " Public Affairs Director Steve Cohen said, "It's in my room."

At the start of the convention at the Worcester Centrum, the UDems were met by equally enthusiastic supporters backing rival candidate Michael Barrett.

Ted Kennedy ushered in by Van Halen's "Right Now" with new wife Vicky by his side delivered the key note address to the delegates and supporters. Kennedy's "We have not yet begun to fight" theme charged the crowd.

"I would stick my hand in the fire for that man," Board of Governors Chair George Fitzgerald said.

Kennedy's undertones of support for gun control and universal health care drew a large response.

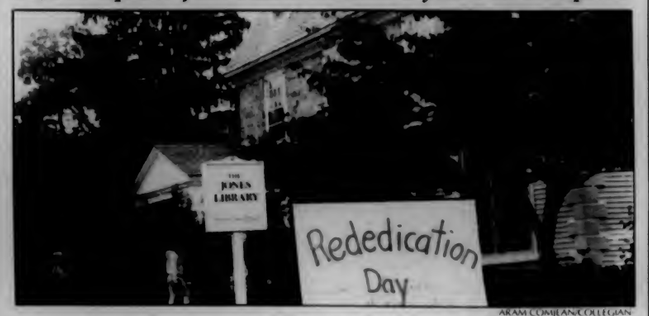
"A family's health should not be determined by a family's wealth," Kennedy said.

Following the JFK Scholars Award presentation to Neil Carpenter, a junior at the University and president of the college Democrats of Massachusetts, State Attorney General Scott Harshbarger introduced the two gubernatorial candidates Michael Barrett and Mark Roosevelt.

"Either one of the two fine candidates is a good choice," Harshbarger said, "as long as we make sure all's well, that ends Weld."

State Senator Michael Barrett addressed the crowd attacking Weld's "sky box economics" while promising to walk across the state bringing his case to the people.

"We have a Governor who ignores the state's economy spending his work day watching sporting games from sky boxes," Barrett said, "I guess the Massachusetts economics look pretty small from the sky box."



Barrett also commented on how is heart goes out to everyone he's met on the way that have fallen on hard times "and Bill Weld will never see."

Following Barrett's speech, Mark Roosevelt spoke of "our lost faith in leaders and in our ability to get back

Library addition lauded

20,000 square foot addition took 3 years to complete

ARAM COMJEAN/COLLEGIAN
The Jones Library, located in Amherst Center, had its new addition dedicated on Saturday.

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Correspondent

The completion of a 20,000 square foot addition to the Jones Library in Amherst was celebrated during the library's official rededication ceremonies on Saturday.

"It was a long project and this is our official end," said Friends of the Jones Library President Katie George.

The addition, first conceived of eight years ago, was completed last March after three years of construction.

The day long program of events opened with a performance on the library's front yard by the Juggler Meadow Morris Dancers, a local dance group.

Afterward a series of speeches were given in the library's central courtyard.

Library Director Bonnie Isman thanked many of the people involved in the planning and construction of the addition, including architect Mark Mitchell.

"Mark really seemed to understand the personality of the building," said Isman.

Isman also addressed the useful functions of the Jones Library, noting the library's childrens reading program and English tutoring services.

"We make room for things here," said Isman.

Cheryl Wilson, former President of the library's Board of Trustees, traced the financial planning and fundraising which made the addition possible. State, local and private funds all were used to pay for the addition.

Over two and a half million dollars was awarded to the project through a grant from the State's Board of Libraries.

Another major source of funding was the auctioning off of a Bierstadt painting owned by the library for over two million dollars.

Wilson also thanked the library staff members who were forced to deal with the inconveniences created by the construction of the addition.

"They put up with, pardon the expression, sheer hell," said Wilson.

An address was also given by Ellsworth Barnard, a 1928 graduate of Massachusetts Agricultural College. Barnard has been an English professor at a number of universities, including the University of Massachusetts.

Barnard spoke of the value and importance of books and said that he feels aggravated by those who are willing to spend large sums of money on children's video games but don't want to pay taxes to support a public library.

He also noted that books provide education and social awareness.

"I like the idea that books and freedom go together," said Barnard. "There are powerful forces in society today that keep people's minds, especially those of children, in servitude."

Over a dozen other events were held throughout the afternoon in honor of the rededication. Programs included a reading by Pulitzer Prize winning poet Richard Wilbur and a demonstration on the art of restoring rare books.

The library's collection of original manuscripts by Amherst poets Emily Dickinson, Robert Frost and Robert Francis was also on display.

Language important to feminist movement

The focus of the lecture was her study of socio-linguistics, the study of language in a social context relating to gender, race and class.

Avarez has done extensive research among Puerto Ricans with respect to gender. She said these women are "innovators of change while at the same time people that hold on to tradition."

She said she discovered that the women in her study were more likely to learn English, while the men tended to fall in to the "immigration trap", speaking only Spanish without learning English. Avarez also noticed the women in her study had more education than the men, but were

Lecturer speaks on problems that have gripped Lebanon

By MIKE SMITH
Collegian Staff

Professor Kamal Salibi lectured a small crowd at Smith College last Thursday on the topic of "Community, State and Nation in the Arab Levant." It was a lecture Dr. Salibi was uniquely qualified to deliver.

As a scholar who has been involved with the University of Beirut as both a student and professor for over forty years, he watched as Lebanon's capital turned from a beautiful, prosperous city into a nightmarish place where the sides were hard to delineate.

The "Levant" refers to the modern day countries of Syria, Jordan and Lebanon which, Salibi said, were constructed by colonial powers after the defeat of the Ottoman Empire in WWI. These false boundaries were just one of the factors which led to problems for the Levant later on. Salibi said that a state which can handle two or more nations (nation being defined as a "people with a sense of self but without a government") within its borders, than this plurality could act as a powerful guard against tyranny.

However, if nationalist feelings outweigh the sense of state unity, the state will fall into anarchy. Such was the case with Lebanon, and also rings true for what was once Yugoslavia.

Salibi then turned to the issue of community that must be all too familiar to him. Lebanon is made up of three major communities which came to be defined in political terms in the modern era. These communities acted in a "client-patron" manner, where a member in need could approach community leaders for help in turn for their loyalty etc.

The Lebanese Christians, called Maronites, were organized under the Phalangist Party and, though a minority, held the official seats of power. The Druze, a mountain based people were organized under the Progressive Socialist Party, and the Shiite Muslims, under AMAL.

Though each party espoused Lebanese nationalism as their ideologies, the reality was that they were loyal to their own community. These political parties maintained their own militias during the civil wars. The leaders of these, communities, or "clects," (half clan, half sect) took advantage of their clect members' fears, paranoia and communal sense of honor to promote their political ends, Salibi said.

Clect allegiance has been one of the factors that have created problems for the Levant in its 70 odd years of statehood, most noticeably in Lebanon. Salibi, with visible relief, said that in Lebanon, "communalism has outlived its use."

Point. Counterpoint.

Some answers are needed for the crisis in Somalia

By PAUL ALEXANDER
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The worst seemed to be over for Somalia in May, with starvation virtually ended and Mogadishu's streets safer than they had been for nearly four years.

Today, the United Nations and the United States find themselves looking for a way out of the tangled mess that was supposed to be a blueprint for future U.N. peacemaking operations.

June 5 — a month and a day after the U.N. took control of Operation Restore Hope from the United States — was the turning point. Twenty four Pakistani troops were killed in coordinated ambush.

Since then, the U.N. has found itself drawn into an urban guerrilla war and a pubic relations quagmire that have stymied the agency's efforts at nation building.

"This blueprint is very complex," U.N. special envoy Adm. Jonathan Howe admitted last week. "It may have to be redrawn in several ways."

In May, Pakistani troops took over control of south Mogadishu after the departure of most U.S. forces, patrolling the bustling streets in open pickup trucks.

Today, few military vehicles stray far from U.N. strong points. They are waiting for the last of the American tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles to arrive, along with the U.S. reinforcements that have been trickling in.

Rocks once were among the biggest threats for foreign troops. Now they face remote controlled land mines, rocket propelled grenades, and heavy caliber machine guns. There are rumors of even heavier weaponry.

Gen. Mohamed Farrah Aidid had seen his influence steadily erode following the arrival of foreign troops, but he appears to have own the tactical fight for now. One of the country's top warlords, he was blamed for the Pakistani massacre and ensuing attacks in U.N. troops.

He is disliked by some of Somalia's other clans, but has built a reputation among his own people as a wronged freedom fighter. The $25,000 U.N. bounty on his head seems a thing of the past, and he is trying to force his way back onto the political scene.

Both sides have suffered heavy casualties.

There's no accurate count of Somali fatalities, but they are believed to be close to 1,000, according to U.N. military officials.

U.S. warships present in Haiti to scan waters

By DAVID BEARD
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — The first U.S. warship was spotted Sunday off the coast of Haiti, and the Pentagon said all six ships sent by President Clinton to enforce an imminent worldwide oil and arms embargo were in place.

The ships should begin patrolling international waters off Haiti by Sunday night, 24 hours before the embargo is scheduled to begin, said Stanley Schrager, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Haiti.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman, Maj. Steve Little, said all six ships were in place Sunday morning, although they might not be visible from shore.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman, Maj. Steve Little, said all six ships were in place Sunday morning, although they might not be visible from shore.

But residents in one Port au Prince neighborhood reported seeing a gray warship, with a helicopter in the rear deck, off the coast.

An Associated Press reporter on an aerial survey spotted it halfway between the island of Gonave and the capital. Schrager said he did not know which ship it was.

Meanwhile, fear was rising in Port au Prince as those opposed to the return of ousted President Jean Bertrand Aristide announced they will shut down the city on Monday. Previous shutdown calls have succeeded, with help from military and allied civilian gangs.

Nearly all U.N. personnel have been evacuated from Haiti, and more than 1,000 Haitians jammed onto trucks Sunday to leave the capital.

The United States has told its 1,000 American nationals to be cautious, but had no plans Sunday to follow the Canadians in recommending a mass departure, the U.S. spokesman said.

more marginal in the workforce.

Avarez said these facts contradict the assumption that if immigrants learn English, it will be easier for them to get jobs.

One of Avarez's key projects was her study of the oral histories of migration. Her studies revealed the continuity of cultural practices from generation to generation.

Avarez said this was a turning point in integrating her skills and situating her life in relation to her mother and grandmother and the generations of women that went before her.

Avarez's involvement in the International Cross-Cultural Black Women's Studies Summer Institute involves forums with women from countries like Zimbabwe, New Zealand and Venezuela. Through this group, she said she has learned that the definition of black changes depending on which society a person lives in. However, historically, politically and economically, the bridge that connects these women is a bridge of oppression.

Through her involvement in cross-cultural groups, Avarez hopes to help model leadership to follow and to provide a way for women of color to understand their history in order to help them achieve in the future.

Minuteman misconstrued

In the years just before the Revolution, military companies were formed to defend the colonies when the safety of their inhabitants and their property was judged to be in danger. Made up of volunteers within each province, the companies were trained to bear arms, perfect themselves in military skill and be prepared to fight "at a minute's notice." Thus, these companies were called "Minutemen."

E.C.
THOMAS

"I will truly and faithfully serve in the Massachusetts army, to which I belong, for the defence and security of the estates, lives and liberties of the good people of this and the sister colonies in America, in opposition to ministerial tyranny by which they are or may be oppressed..." This was the oath the Minutemen took in May, 1775, and continued to take throughout enlistment during the American Revolutionary War.

It was through their courage and dedication that the fight against colonialism was waged, and waged successfully. At the core of their existence was the belief in liberty. And when they fought, they promoted not only their liberties, but our own as well. Honorably, the most famous Minutemen were from our own state of Massachusetts.

The claim that the Minuteman as a symbol for this University is racist and sexist and should be changed is misguided and simply not thought through. Not only is the claim ideologically unsound, it is also economically impossible.

At a time when budget cuts and tuition increases are running rampant throughout our campus, to re-vamp our entire line of University advertising, from new bags at the University store to new uniforms for our athletes would be an expense the students of this institution simply can't afford.

While I appreciate Chancellor Scott's consideration to hear both sides, he must understand that the students of this University will no longer foot the bill for every malcontent's claim of injustice; especially when, as in this case, they are a minute fraction of this campus.

The ideology that brought the claim of racism and sexism against the Minuteman is understandable when the Minuteman is taken out of context and solely at his surface value.

While I acknowledge the fact that there are negative connotations involved with the colonial militia and the Minutemen, I feel the positive aspects far outweigh the bad.

The Minuteman is part of Massachusetts history; a history that might have never been, were it not for his endeavors.

Were it not for the Minutemen, this country might still be a colony of, and for England. Were it not for the Minutemen we might never have known of such a thing as the Constitution and the First Amendment. Were it not for the Minutemen, those who feel injustice within the Government (or an institution such as this one) might never be given the chance to speak their grievances. Indeed, it is paradoxical that those who oppose the Minuteman are essentially opposing the freedom to oppose.

Within the context of history, the Minuteman represents liberty. The total outcome of his courage and devotion in fighting for this belief is the United States of America. He is a symbol we should be proud of, for he is a symbol of freedom. He is anything but just a white man with a gun.

E.C. Thomas is a Collegian columnist.

Minuteman issue is addressed

The idea of getting rid of the Minuteman here at UMass is ridiculous. If 40 people are going to start dictating what the other 23,000 students on this campus think, then it is time to pack up our bags, leave our rooms, and head back home. In 1972 this campus changed it's nickname from the "redmen" to the "Minutemen," because it was under pressure from Indian groups to change the symbol. Maybe this was justified, but changing it again is totally unwarranted. The "Minuteman" is a symbol of patriotism, not only to this school, but to the entire country.

Mark Awdycki
Southwest

As a member of the Class of 1972 and an active participant in that era's social and political events, I read in the Boston Globe with amusement over the ongoing protest to change the Minuteman logo at UMass. It appears that some of today's university students have elevated social and political activism to truly new heights.

In a modern world overloaded with serious social and economic problems, I am truly disappointed at this level of student activism. I think the protestors really need to get a life. There are much more important issues that need to be addressed rather than the fatuous issue of the political correctness of a university logo.

Lano Balulescu
Ensign Paymaster (Elect)
Concord Minutemen

As a resident of Lexington, Mass., I pass a huge statue of the Minuteman every time I drive through the center of town. I believe that the Minuteman statue epitomizes the meaning of American liberty. It is a perfect reminder of the freedom that we Americans enjoy and a tribute to the patriots who fought to ensure this freedom. I implore Chancellor David Scott to focus his attention and devote his time to more pressing University issues and dismiss this matter. Hopefully the small group of protestors can think of a more constructive use of their time.

Katie DeBellis
Amherst

The Minuteman is oppressive and sexist. That's right! That is why the Minutemen formed militias (that's apparently what they called gangs back then) in Massachusetts. They roamed the street kicking up cobblestone, oppressing and sexisting. They fought the English Redcoats at Lexington and Concord just because the English wanted to liberate us from our money by using higher taxes. Perhaps, our mascot should be a woman with a mace can. She should be wearing some tie-dye and paisley, blue jeans, an ALLY pin on her backpack and have a joint in her hand.

Steven Lee
Orchard Hill

All I can say is congratulations to Martin Jones for making UMass and it's student body look foolish to those who view the Happy Valley from a far. I don't know what the response to your quest to change the Minuteman logo is in Amherst, but in Boston people are laughing at you. Maybe you should take a history course and fill some of the free time you have on your hands and learn some facts about the Minutemen and what they did for America, before you start bashing them. I feel embarrassed for the "real" students that attend UMass.

U.S. war policy is insane

The United States of America is at war. The U.S. has been more consistently at war, whether these wars be declared, undeclared, or outright illegal, than any other nation standing in the world today.

In the past thirty years: Laos. The Dominican Republic. Vietnam. Cambodia. Chile. Iran. El Salvador. Afghanistan. Honduras. Nicaragua. Lebanon. Grenada. Libya. Panama. Kuwait. Iraq. Kurdistan. Somalia. Haiti.

Peter
ORVETTI

War is the domain of the psychotic. Unwinnable in any form, it is the planned bringing about of death and massive destruction.

It is an art so masterfully grotesque that it can only be choreographed by men of insanity. Our most powerful generals have been those who had something to prove to the world, or to themselves.

They are men who, for whatever reason, have come to love death. They are hunters who love to bring death to others - who love to kill.

No war has ever been prosecuted by men of honor, for there is no honor in the execution of genocide. There was no glory at Kettle Hill for Theodore Roosevelt, no honor for Douglas MacArthur in the Pacific. There was no pride in France for George Patton, and no heroism for Norman Schwarzkopf at the Iraq-Kuwait line.

War is the raining of fire, in the form of bombs and napalm, upon children and families. War is the clamoring masses of Vietnam losing their grip on the underside of American helicopters as they flee, falling to their death. War is a radiation-poisoned Japan, a soldier beaten to submission, a body dragged through the streets of Mogadishu.

War is a perverse game played by children. The average age for soldiers in that game played in Vietnam was nineteen. War is the strapping of weapons onto the backs of the young, the packing of children into transport planes, and the sending of these innocents into the landscape of a country they've never heard of for a reason that's never been clearly defined.

War is in itself a crime, a atrocity that cannot be abided. It is the use of brute power to force opponents into submission.

How can we tell our youngest children not to strike one another as we send their older brothers and sisters to enemy lands, as our planes and guns shun discussion and negotiation for the blow of a fist?

We are hypocrites in the eyes of morality, America, every time we criticize our foes as aggressors.

War is not just sixty thousand names on a wail in Washington. It is several million American names that will never be written down.

It is one quarter of a million Iraqi civilians with no dispute against us, now lying in burial fields never to be counted. It is the charred remains of Vietnam, bodies singed to black by napalm. It is the starving of Somalia, given a bullet as nourishment.

War is a murder as much a crime as any other. It is the use of the innocent, the children, as fodder for bullets.

It is the inhuman calculation of sending lines of young boys up to be shot, knowing that only their number, and not their names, will be remembered.

It is the cursed thought that there is any number of deaths that can be called an "acceptable loss." It is the cruel, cold assertion that certain human lives are expendable.

War will not allow the perpetrator to wash his hands. William J. Clinton is committing himself to a course of dark murder of scores of the hungry and oppressed.

It is to be hoped that he has the stomach to stand the stench of the bodies rotting in the Somalian sun, and the strength of mind to stand the thought that it is because of him that these bodies there lie.

I just don't understand...

Walking through the campus of this University is sometimes puzzling. Well, I'll be honest — some things just don't make any sense. So without hesitation, I'd like to share some things that I don't quite get, and maybe you can relate...

Arthur
STAPLETON JR.

• The entrance doors at Hampshire Mall: Besides being a poor excuse for a place to hang out, the doors have push bars that cause me plenty of problems. Why, you ask? Because you have to pull to get in. Obviously someone from UMass designed these beauties.

• Three slices and a Diet Coke: Have you ever heard of a worse contradiction? The point of dieting is to eat less in order to lose weight. These people who think they can eat more when they are on a diet because they drink a "Diet" soda are missing the point. Next thing you know Mr. and Mrs. Weight-Gain will be heading uptown for some frozen yogurt, fat-free of course. While our happy couple is there they might as well have a few "light" beers to continue the trend. The best is, though, three weeks down the road they will tell you, "This diet isn't working."

• Fighting over a biscuit: The D.C. causes many problems for me. No, I'm not going to rank on the food and how bad it is. Actually, I like the chicken pucks. What gets me are the rules of the D.C. line ladies, especially when there are two half-way decent choices for dinner and they get real nasty with you.

Case in point, one night it was either stew with a biscuit or roast turkey. I wanted turkey with a biscuit. The lady told me no.

I could only have a biscuit with stew, she said. I'll admit I was pretty upset over a biscuit; yes, a biscuit.

Guess she underestimated my cunning and doubted I had the intelligence to grab another plate and get the damn biscuit sooner or later.

• Going after commission: I was in the Holyoke Mall the other night trying to buy a jacket, and before I got both feet in a store, the sales rep was in my face telling me how happy he was to see me.

First off, I worked in retail for three years; I know all about commission and the employee's responsibility to help the customer.

Fine. Don't you know I know that all you are doing is brown-nosing for extra cash, you sell-out?

Showing me a patch on the sleeve that allows you to look at your watch without taking your gloves off isn't going to win me over, either.

• Hoarding beach balls: If you've ever been to a concert or a professional sporting event, maybe you have seen this — an usher lunging over two rows of screaming fans to snag... a beach ball.

Is this in their job description: Do not let fans think they are on beach, or get your pay docked.

• Women: Enough said.

State transferred patients to poor Noho facility

BOSTON (AP) — In its attempt to shift services to the private sector, the state last year transferred dozens of psychiatric patients to a private hospital that had shoddy facilities, an audit found.

The 45 patients were moved to Charles River Hospital West in Chicopee from Northampton State Hospital, which closed last month.

A review performed by House Post Audit and Oversight Committee found that Charles River Hospital West had unqualified staff, unsafe facilities and a shaky fiscal picture when it won an $11 million contract form the state to care for mentally ill patients.

Community Care Systems Inc. of Wellesley, the hospital's parent company, had operating losses of $15 million in the previous three years.

Findings of the audit were reported Sunday in The Boston Globe.

State Rep. William P. Nagle Jr., D-Northampton, chairman of the Democratic dominated committee, used the audit to criticize Gov. William F. Weld's policy of privatizing state services.

"What a cruel hoax we have here," he said. "They're disregarding the most vulnerable people in our society for the sake of saying, 'We privatized this function.' The Weld administration wanted this to work at all costs and they didn't want to be bothered with the details."

A state Department of Mental Health spokesman said his agency had cooperated with researchers but had not been given the report.

"It would have been fair to allow the Department of Mental Health to see any report issued before it was put in the public domain, and then we could have commented on it," said John Widdison.

Democratic lawmakers have battled the Republican governor over hiring private companies to do public work.

A spokesman for the hospital could not be reached for comment Sunday. Marketing director Camille Evers did not immediately return a phone call to her home.

The report did find that the quality of care at Charles River Hospital West has improved substantially in 18 months.

Blood Speaks' irony captures audience

By JOY COLLINS
Collegian Staff

The poster that advertised the play 1992 Blood Speaks did not mention a roller coaster. However, that was precisely what the audience members experienced - an extremely emotional, eclectic and moving roller coaster ride.

1992 Blood Speaks was presented on October 15 and 16 at Hampden Theater at UMass; both nights sold out. The play was presented by New WORLD Theater, a UMass Fine Arts Center program which presents the dramatic works of people of color to the community.

The play was written by Hortensia and Elvira Colorado, who act/storytell in it along with Pura Fe and Soni Moreno-Primeau. The Colorado sisters are also the founding members of the Coatlicue Las Colorado theater company.

This dramatic interpretation of history looked at the irony of celebrating Columbus' 500th anniversary, through the eyes of Native Americans. The duality of history was well illustrated.

The play moved at a rapid pace and incorporated traditional scenery with superimposed video-taped scenes of village life and an interview with a Zapotec woman from Oaxaca, Mexico.

This translucent, layered effect gave the illusion of time passage without obliterating the past, effectively illustrating the relationship of past events to present ones. This aspect was essential to the message of the play.

In an earlier interview, Elvira Colorado spoke of the importance of remembering that the "invasion" that Columbus began is not over, as long as Native American people are still being robbed of their languages and cultures.

Though the play had plenty of comic relief, the humor had an ironic lining. In one scene, we were given party hats and horns to prepare for a surprise party for Christopher Colombus. While we were told to clap and blow the horns, they ran across the stage holding up signs that read "SYPHILIS" and "GONORRHEA"

The play evoked a mish-mash of emotions in the audience because of its startling irony and mixture of stories. It was passionately performed and this was reflected in the audience's reactions.

Woven delicately into the play were many personal stories and issues, many histories and periods of time, many languages and songs and many generations of storytelling. The finished product is a thought provoking masterpiece that made its audience experience the duality and subjectivity of history firsthand.

CONTEST!

Hey, all you wacky dorm chefs and noodle fans, here is your chance to prove yourselves able cooks and tasteful members of society. If you have a particularly funky recipe for those packaged, dry noodles (as in Ramen Noodles, Cup-of-Noodles, generic renditions of the Price Chopper caliber,) we want to know about it. Five finalists will prepare their recipes to be judged by Collegian staff members. The most creative (and yummy) culinary combination will win 5 CD's of the cook's choice, and the runner-up will win 3, courtesy of Sony Records. Mail or bring your recipe to:

Drama turns Yonkers into staged soap opera

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

Lost in Yonkers
Saturday Oct. 16
Fine Arts Center

I like Lost in Yonkers, in spite of myself.

Perhaps this is the only way that one can like a show of such effusive sentiment and melodrama. But it is an acknowledgment of Neil Simon's manipulative skill that one can so readily identify his play as an over-inflated soap opera, and still end up crying and cheering.

Set in World War Two-era New York, Yonkers is the story of two young boys (Alex P. Baack and Danny Cistone) who are left to the care of the tyrannical Grandma Kurnitz (Elaine Grollman, direct from the Canadian production,) while their father travels the country as a salesman. Doing time with the boys, in the confining apartments over "Kurnitz's Kandy Store," are a couple of unsettling relatives: the grim Uncle Louie (Daniel Oreskes, late of Broadway's Song of Jacob Zulu,) a pennyante bag-man hiding out from the mob, and the loopy Aunt Bella (Dee Dee Friedman,) a 35 year-old child hiding out from the world.

Turn to YONKERS, page 8

The play is a series of comic and dramatic episodes spanning the ten months that the boys spend in Yonkers. Simon uses this format to pack in many messages: Louie teaching the boys courage, Bella teaching them love, and Grandma teaching them respect.

What makes the play worthwhile is the quality of these sketches. Grandma, in particular, is a vivid creation who brings strong life to familiar situations. Sufferingwithout complaint, Grandma has devoted a feverish intensity to teaching her children endurance, but neglected to show them love. Her iron will both bears up and stifles.

Every good soap opera villain deserves an emotional moment, and Grandma gets hers in Act Two — when Bella accuses her of destroying her own children. "Whatever we are, you made us," Bella shouts, crying that her siblings who died as children "were the lucky ones."

It is an obvious moment, but the way that Grollman buckles under this accusation gives the scene incredible power. The towering ogre with the cold eyes and hard voice is suddenly just an old woman, again. Her cane is no longer a weapon, but a crutch to carry her back to her chair, where she cries and pleads in a frightened voice: "don't say that, please."

If there is a shortcoming to this play, it is the disproportionate amount of time devoted to the simpleminded Bella, and to the questionable lover she finds at the movies. Because we never leave the rooms above the candy shop, too many of Bella's peak emotional moments are related second-hand. We are too detached to feel joy at her discovery of love, or pain as this love is withdrawn.

Also interesting is the development of the young Jay, the sensitive, intelligent youth who alone in this household seems to bear the weight of reality. He is the only one who seems to understand the futility of Bella's life, the pain of Grandma's, or the unromantic danger of Louie's. As played by the scene-stealing Alex P. Baack, Jay seems like a reflection of the playwright as a young man, and the audience is drawn to him somewhat more than his minor part might suggest.

In this production, as with the movie version, there is an elegant smoothness; a gloss which makes the pains of the past seem quaint and romantic.

It is almost as if we are remembering our own lives, and, sometimes, the memories can be very sweet.

■ road

The game was a tense one, with two ties, two fourth quarter TDs and a go-ahead 40-yard field goal in the waning moments by UMass' Eric Oke. Only after Breon Parker intercepted UConn QB Zeke Rodgers with one minute left was victory secured for the visitors.

"This road victory silences that little rumor that we can't win away from home," cornerback Tony Williams said.

The hero through all this was Rene Ingoglia, who shuffled, scampered, shoved, lunged and dove his way to 179 rushing yards. The sophomore fullback took a beating all day, and after 35 carries Ingoglia looked exhausted but felt sky high.

While sitting on a car bumper waiting for the post-game press conference, he whispered to Hodges, "This is the best win since I've been here," and the coach smiled and nodded his head.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Spend more time on details and figures. Students find that financial aid is available but that they must fill out endless forms. Persist. Diligence impresses those who count.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You could attract some unusual companions now. Stick to a conventional approach in business or romance. A long-time conflict will abate if you take the first step.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A financial problem that has created marital discord comes to an end. Profit-sharing plans to bring new security. Be punctual. Romance puts you in a joyful mood.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A promising start could peter out unless you tackle a financial question. Be more realistic about your spending. A love relationship is more rewarding than in the past.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Unexpected rewards, bonuses and scholarships are featured. Couples have good luck with their commitments. Family concerns lead you to re-evaluate the benefits of you work. Romance deepens. Go slow.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Tried-and-true friends will be the most satisfying companions now. New information means changing your approach in business or romance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Shared financial ventures are favored. Important decisions will have to be made. Gather all the facts and figures you can, then consult your partner. Lend a sympathetic ear to parents or children.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Do not despair if those in authority will not listen to your ideas. Increase your earning power by taking special seminars or enrolling in night school. Discuss your dreams without embarrassment.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The emphasis today is on security measures. Check for fire hazards. Taking a more compassionate approach will help you solve a family conflict. Be supportive of a youngster who shares a secret.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Travel, literature and socializing brighten your day. A long-standing dispute can be resolved to your satisfaction. A search for spiritual enlightenment will be rewarding.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Concentrate on one thing at a time and productivity will rise. Taxes, insurance matters and investments require special attention. Admit past mistakes.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March. 20): Emotional satisfaction comes from pushing ahead with a favorite work endeavor. New financial rewards are likely. Do not be afraid to share your thoughts with loved ones.

ball 66 yards up the field, capped off by tailback Wilbur Gilliard's 1-yard touchdown and kicker Nick Sosik's extra point.

Minuteman kicker Eric Oke, who missed a 35-yard field goal after a UMass 81-yard drive early in the first quarter, redeemed himself by booting a 19-yarder to make it 7-3 at the end of the first half.

The Huskies gained the momentum once again in the second half as they scored on Sosik's 38-yard field goal.

After the two teams exchanged punts, the Minutemen drove the ball 65 yards for the score. Johnson broke free for his 59-yard run, and Ingoglia ran wide left for a six-yard TD.

The Minutemen scored early in the fourth quarter on a 1-yard TD by fullback David Smith. Oke booted the PAT, giving UMass its first lead of the game, 17-10.

After UConn scored on the 40-yard Nowden TD, the Minutemen had the ball on the UConn 6-yard line before QB Andrew McNeilly (6-9, 63 yards) fumbled the ball away to the Huskies. The UMass defense then forced the Huskies to punt on the next drive, setting up Oke's game winner.

Heidi Kocher and Rebecca Myers each added goals.

Amy Powell, Nikki Arenholz and Sarah Goddard all played well in reserve. Briana Scurry (80 minutes) and Sherry Kennan shared the shutout.

In Saturday's contest, UMass fired 30 shots at Colonial goalkeeper Traci Jensen and only one got through — a Melissa Mitchell rebound in the second half to knot the score at 1-1. Despite deserving the win, UMass was forced to settle for the tie.

"You've got to give the Jensen credit, she came up with the big plays," Rudy said. "She put on a clinic."

goalie Mindy Pritzman.

"I felt really good when we got that goal because I think we needed it just to stop their momentum," said Rothenberger. "The team really responded after that goal and we really kept the pressure on."

"When we got our goal, it gave us a little more confidence to take control of the situation," Hixon said.

Tara Jelley stole a pass deep in the offensive zone and shot it past Pritzman with less than five minutes remaining to ice the victory. UMass improved its record to 13-1. Ball State fell to 8-6.

The Minutewomen completed the sweep of their A-10 regular season with a 4-0 rout of the Rhode Island WRams on Saturday.

UMass scored early and often, dominating the first half to open up a 3-0 lead. URI could muster no offense at all: no shots in the first half and only six in the entire game.

Hart opened the scoring at 3:06, blasting a shot by URI goalie Kellie Gorman on a penalty corner.

Junior forward Banielle Borges struck next. Jenn Salisbury raced down the right side of the field past two URI defenders before flipping the ball to Borges, who beat Gorman.

Jelley added a goal at 20:20 of the first half and a another early in the second half to insure the Minutewomen blowout.

Hixon emptied the bench in the second half, and the young players looked impressive in their longest stints of the season. Redshirt freshmen Stacy Walker, who replaced Rose in the UMass goal, and Jen Gutzman turned in strong performances.

The victory insures UMass of the top seed in the upcoming A-10 Championships. The loss dropped the WRams to 2-9-1.

Football wins first on road at UConn

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. — In what many of the players called "the biggest win" of their collegiate careers, the University of Massachusetts football team won its first road game of the season Saturday, defeating the University of Connecticut 20-17.

Massachusetts 20
Connecticut 17

"Rene (Ingoglia) and I were talking on the way in here, and we don't know if we have ever been around a bigger win," said senior offensive lineman Bill Durkin.

An Eric Oke's field goal with 2:43 remaining in regulation, broke a 17-17 tie and proved to be the game winner as a Breon Parker interception squelched a last-minute Husky rally.

Parker, last week's Sports Illustrated Defensive Player of the Week, picked off a UConn quarterback Zeke Rodgers pass and returned the ball 33 yards with 50 seconds left in the game to secure the victory.

Parker, who earlier in the fourth quarter allowed UConn wide receiver Monte Nowden to elude him for a 40-yard touchdown, did finish with 10 tackles and the interception.

"I really don't think he saw me," said Parker. "(Rodgers) did the same thing all game. It was coming out there, but I just couldn't make the play all game. It was the same read for me, the same play, except that it was crunch time."

The ground game carried the Minuteman offense once again, as Yankee Conference rushing leader Rene Ingoglia finished with 179 yards on 35 carries and John Johnson ran for a season-high 118 yards on 18 carries, including a spectacular 59-yard run.

The Minutemen ran the ball 28 out of the last 29 plays of the game, giving Ingoglia and Johnson much of their yardage in the second half. Ingoglia gave much of the credit to his offensive line.

"I look into the (offensive linemen's) eyes, and even though they could be the most tired guys in the world, they are fighting, they're digging in the trenches," said Ingoglia. "It just lifts you up. The second carry, the 40th carry, it doesn't matter. We just pound it."

The Huskies scored in the first five minutes of the game as they drove the Battered UM turns corner with road win

STORRS, Conn. — With seven home games this season and only four on the road, the University of Massachusetts football team looked, on paper, to be a good bet to win eight or nine games.

By simply winning two of its games away from home, UMass would put itself in good position in the Yankee Conference. After all, they have won seven of their last eight games at home.

Unfortunately, things have not worked out as planned, and facing the University of Connecticut in their third road game, the Minutemen needed to break the ice.

Playing against Maine on the road during week two, the University of Massachusetts football team collapsed when the Black Bears came out on the attack, and fell 17-13. The next week, the Minutemen did not have a chance against the Red Gun offense of Boston University and quarterback Robert Dougherty, and they fell to 0-2 as visitors.

Heading into UConn's Homecoming, the Minutemen needed a road victory to answer all the critics who said the team was a much easier foe on the road. What they got was an outstanding overall performance on both sides of the ball in a 20-17 thriller.

"It was definitely the biggest win we've had in a while," said senior John Johnson, who ran for 118 yards on 18 carries. "It was important because it was the next game, and to go into another team's Homecoming and play hard."

"It was a tremendous win," said offensive guard Bill Durkin. "I don't know if there's ever been so many people say UMass can't win on the road, but we take it personal.

"The field is still made of grass and 100 yards long here. This road win was a very, very big win."

The Minutemen attacked the Huskies with a simple game plan: run the ball down their throats. The team ran 69 running plays and nine passing plays, a contrast to the 38 passes quarterback Andrew McNeilly threw in the Maine loss.

"Our offensive line takes a lot of pride in controlling the line of scrimmage," said UMass Coach Mike Hodges. "We want to throw the ball when we want to, not when we have to.

"I think this is our best football effort of the year, and I'll tell you what — I'm just very proud of everyone one of those guys."

Minutewomen sweep weekend

Two more challengers fell by the wayside this weekend as the third ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team extended its winning streak to thirteen games, defeating No. 9 Ball State (2-0) and Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island (4-0).

A measuring stick for championship caliber teams is if they can play below their best and still find ways to win. Ball State dominated UMass for the majority of Sunday's contest, but the Minutewomen still came out victorious.

The Cardinals came out gunning for the upset from the opening hit against a Minutewomen team that appeared flat. They played hard and forced UMass into an uncharacteristic amount of mishits and turnovers.

"Ball State had the momentum a lot during this game," said UMass Coach Pam Hixon. "We misfielded the balls a lot, and turned the ball over a lot."

If it wasn't for the spectacular play of goaltender Hilary Rose, Ball State might have opened up an early lead. The Cardinals kept a steady attack, but Rose was up to the task, turning back a career high sixteen shots.

"I prefer to be busy," said Rose. "Once you get into the match you get on a roll and its easier to make the saves."

"Hilary played the game of her life today," said Hixon. "We needed every save she had."

Throughout the season, freshmen midfielder Kyle Rothenberger has come up with goals in key situations for the Minutewomen.

With a little over a minute remaining in the first half she came through again, taking a pass from Natalie Hart off a penalty corner and beating Cardinal

Women's soccer clinches A-10

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team entered the season as the heavy favorite to capture the inaugural Atlantic 10 regular season championship. Yesterday, with a 4-0 victory over St. Bonaventure, the seventh-ranked Minutewomen took the A-10 title, but they did not do it as planned.

UMass 4, St. Bonaventure 0
UMass 1, Geo. Washington 1

After Saturday's disappointing 1-1 tie with George Washington, the chances of UMass winning the league appeared slim. GW (3-0-1 in the A-10 going into Sunday's game) had to only tie the lowly Rhode Island Rams (0-4 in the A-10) to sure up the title. UMass, at 2-0-2 in conference, was stuck in second.

But the improbable happened yesterday, as the previously lifeless Rams (UMass downed URI, 5-0, earlier in the year) upset GW 1-0 and coupled with the Minutewomen's 4-0 victory over St. Bonaventure, gave UMass the title and the No. 1 seed in the A-10 Tournament held Oct. 30-31 at Rutgers.

"It's nice to win the A-10," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "It was one of our goals before the season.

"Now we want to win New England, take the A-10 Tournament, win the NCAA Regional and then see if I have any energy left for the Final Four," Rudy joked.

Yesterday, UMass played like champions, as it thoroughly dominated St. Bonaventure, outshooting the Bonnies 32-1. UMass controlled nearly every ball and at times toyed with the overwhelmed Bonnie defense.

It got so bad for St. Bonaventure that in the 30th minute, UMass forward Melissa Mitchell faked Bonnie senior defender Jolie DeRidder out of her shoes. Literally.

As DeRidder tried to keep up with Mitchell, the defender shifted to her left and blew out the sole of her right shoe. She left the game and spent the next five minutes trying on the shoes of some Bonnie bench warmers until she found a nice fit and returned.

Offensively, Mitchell was not the only one who had her way with the defense. Sophomore Rachel LeDuc scored twice, upping her season total to seven, while

Chancellor target of UM logo backlash

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

Editor's note: Due to the sensitive nature of the issue the Collegian is running the Associated Press story along with contributions from staff writers.

Supporters and critics of the Minuteman logo at University of Massachusetts campus found a common enemy Monday: both condemned the chancellor's attempt to end public debate.

Martin Jones, an anti-Minuteman activist, said he felt so strongly that he was launching a hunger strike "until the chancellor keeps his commitment to free speech and inquiry on this college campus."

See related story, page 3

Jones, a Black student from Springfield, said the Minutemen is a racist, sexist symbol that promoted violence and he wanted the opportunity to convince others.

Chancellor David Scott said he stood by his decision to end formal debate "at this time." But he added "sometime in the future after we gain some perspective in what happened this past week, I and others on this campus will provide a formal forum in which to continue the dialogue."

After Scott announced last week that he encouraged consideration of the militiaman's dishonorable discharge, a group of students formed, calling themselves University of Massachusetts Students and Alumni in support of the Minuteman.

"This isn't the end of it. Chancellor Scott has given new life to the issue," said Mike Carvahlo, a senior from Bolton, Mass., who chairs the group. "We can't ignore this attempt to stifle debate and free exchange of ideas in the interest of spin control."

The president of the Black Student Union said the reaction of most Black students was apathy. Shamapande Shonwa said a larger concern of theirs is coming up with the cash to stay in school.

But private debate was brisk in the concourse of the Student Union Monday.

"It's the best symbol the state University could have," said senior Andrew Sonier, 24, a National Guard veteran.

Both sides accused Scott, who took over in September, of not providing the campus with the leadership it needed over the Minuteman issue.

Scott, who was not on campus Monday, declined to talk to reporters, but issued a statement contending his original aim was to "promote the free exchange of ideas."

"Unfortunately I was unable to provide a productive forum for this dialogue before the issue evolved into a polarizing debate over the valor of the Minuteman in securing freedom for America," Scott said.

The press conference was held yesterday on the Campus Center Concourse. Jones told reporters that CNN would be covering the event.

A call to the news organization yielded no answers. Maria White, the assignments editor, said she had no knowledge of any such story.

L.A. jury acquits two

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Two Blacks were acquitted Monday of most of the felony charges in the beating of White trucker Reginald Denny and other motorists at the start of the 1992 riots, easing fears of renewed racial tensions. The defendants were convicted of lesser counts.

The judge sent the multiracial jury back to deliberate the most serious count — attempted murder against defendant Damian "Football" Williams in the videotaped attack of Denny — and lesser charges on which the panel deadlocked.

Hours later, the panel announced it had decided that Williams was innocent of a robbery charge. Superior Court Judge John Ouderkirk then asked the jury to deliberate the final two counts. Accepting the defense argument that Williams, 20, and his 20-year-old co-defendant acted in the heat of the moment and couldn't have planned their actions.

Williams and Watson sat calmly as the verdicts were read, except when the clerk announced "Not Guilty" on an aggravated mayhem charge against Williams, which could have brought him life in prison. Williams clapped his hands over his eyes, reared back in his seat and hugged his attorney.

The jury convicted Williams on simple mayhem, with a maximum penalty of up to eight years in prison.

In the charges decided against him, Watson was acquitted of all but simple assault on Denny, a lesser related offense that carries only a year in county jail rather than prision. The jury rejected the charge that Watson tried to kill Denny. The count that could have brought him life in prison.

"I am in total agreement," Denny told the TV tabloid show Inside Edition. "They should let the guy go. He spent a year and a half in jail and has had time to think about what happened."

Watson's mother, Joyce, sat in the courtroom's front row. Williams was acquitted of eight counts.

Former Police Chief Daryl Gates, now a radio personality, denounced the verdicts as unjust.

"We know they're guilty. But I understand this is our system," Gates said.

Students react to campus controversy

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY

Press conferences have been held. Rallies, discussions and debate have buzzed around campus for a week. The controversy has graced the pages of major newspapers such as USA Today and Newsweek. Governor Weld, Chancellor Scott, Martin Jones and even Rush Limbaugh have commented on the issue of changing the Minuteman mascot.

However, campus sentiments on the issue have remained mixed.

The Minuteman, a symbol of the rebel militia that formed to fight at the battle of Lexington and Concord became the school symbol in 1972 after a student referendum changed it from "The Redman", because of negative connotations toward Native Americans.

Now, in 1993, it is being argued by the American Freedom Foundation that the symbol should change to be more inclusive of women and people of color on campus.

Lisa Tannenbaum, a junior communications major, finds the issue bigger than just the changing of the mascot, but as an example of institutionalized racism.

"People don't realize how deeply racism has been instilled in our system," said Tannenbaum. "This is just one way of showing people the truly negative effect of institutionalized racism and sexism."

"I don't look at the Minuteman as being racist, I look at people as being racist," said Jose Ocasio, a senior mathematics major. "Let's not look at the past, let's look to the future."

Some students have remained staunchly "pro-Minuteman".

"The Minuteman is the symbol of Massachusetts and America's heritage and history," said Jim Rivers, a sophomore.

"I think the logo is great for the University," said Tom Woodcock, a senior.

And Thor Runeman, a junior, believes that the Minuteman, "truly stands for freedom."

Others find that the University should find something better to focus on.

"There are more pressing issues at the time than the petty matter of the school

Legal Services; a poor man's Perry Mason

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Editor's note:This is the first of a three part series examining the Legal Services Center—its past, present and potential future.

Legal Services Center Staff Attorney Thomas Coish said the LSC at the University of Massachusetts was created in response to the 1960s civil rights movement, calling national attention to the widespread poverty in the United States.

As part of the "war on poverty," the federal governmnet began funding civil legal services programs for the poor in many parts of the country, and by the mid-1970s legal services programs existed in every area of the country.

In the early 1970s, students on campuses nationwide began to protest several local and national issues. In an effort to channel student protest into peaceful and legitimate action, campus administrators supported the establishment of student legal services programs. These programs, which were funded and directed by students, helped them meet some of their legal needs. Today, almost 300 colleges and universities have some form of a legal services program or clinic on campus. Most of these programs provide legal representation in litigation to clients and are supported by their administrations.

In 1971, the student government at UMass hired a part time attorney to provide students with advice and a referral service. In 1974, students opted for more comprehensive legal services, including representation and litigation, and established the Legal Services Office.

The LSO was staffed by four attorneys along with support staff, undergraduate, graduate and law student interns to provide a broad range of advice, referral and representation and legal education services to students.

The types of cases handled by the LSO were determined by its governing board, which was staffed by five undergraduate students, three graduate students, one member of the University administration and one member of the faculty. Most cases handled by the office involved landlord-tenant, consumer, criminal, family and civil rights law. Various problems with the University itself were also faced, although over 80 percent of the LSO cases did not involve the University.

In 1975, the University Board of Trustees authorized the LSO to represent students in litigation involving the University. The trustees approved this proposal for a year before making this authorization permanent in 1976. There were 13 cases litigated by clients represented by LSO over the next ten years, involving housing, academic evaluations, civil rights and police misconduct issues.

In late 1983, an event occurred on campus which became a national embarrassment to the University. An African-American woman was falsely accused of a series of arson attempts in the dorms, and LSO's subsequent defense of her civil rights eventually resulted in total elimination by administrators and trustees of its authority to represent student as clients in any litigation.

Most don't cheat, study says

By Connie Cass
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The vast majority of married Americans don't cheat on their spouses, a sex researcher says, disputing claims that adultery is rampant.

About 15 percent of married or previously married Americans have cheated on a spouse, estimates Tom W. Smith of the National Opinion Research Center.

Perhaps 3 percent to 4 percent of husbands and wives have a sexual partner outside their marriage in a given year, said Smith, director of the center's General Social Surveys.

"There are probably more scientifically worthless facts on extramarital relations than on any other facet of human behavior," Smith said Monday in a report at an American Enterprise Institute seminar.

Author Shere Hite wrote that 75 percent of women married more than five years reported having affairs in response to her questionnaire.

And in a 1990 magazine article, Dr. Joyce Brothers said 50 percent of married women have had affairs.

"The problem has been the lack of good scientific information," Smith said in an interview.

"There's been a vacuum. And when you have a vacuum, something fills it up. It may be Phil Donahue, it may be Shere Hite."

Other studies have found affairs to be more common than the General Social Survey did.

The Kinsey Institute of Sex Research at Indiana University estimated in 1990 that 37 percent of married men and 20 percent of married women have been unfaithful.

An ABC News/Washington Post national telephone poll in 1987 found that 89 percent of respondents said they never had an affair while married.

Anti-Semitic graffiti plagues UM campus

By STEPHANIE EISENBERG
Collegian Staff

A rash of anti-Semitic incidents have been reported on the University of Massachussetts campus in the past few weeks, according to University police reports.

Anti-Semitism is a word used to define the prejudice against the Jewish people and their culture.

The movement peaked in the mid-1940s with the culmination of the Holocaust.

A few weeks ago, a staff member in Lewis House reported that a poster in the building had been defaced with a swastika.

The swastika is an emblem from Nazi Germany.

There have been several other incidents.

Two weeks ago in Stockbridge building, a teacher walked in with her students and found a swastika on the blackboard with the words "I will murder you" written next to it.

The police are still investigating this incident.

In a Morrill classroom, a student said she was horrified to find a swastika carved in the leg of a chair.

This incident was reported to those in the student's department, and their response was to wrap masking tape around the chair leg.

The incident was not reported to the police.

Not reporting anti-Semitic incidents causes a problem because if they are not reported, they "never happened," according to Yehudit Heller.

The police and the University need actual documentation in order to deal with the issue effectively, Heller said.

There are many campus organizations where such incidents can be reported, Heller said.

Occurrences should be reported to the police, those at Hillel, a Resident Assistant or even a professor, Heller said.

The most important thing to do is to report it and gain documentation, according to Heller at the Hillel house.

"Documentation gives us some form of control; if we don't document it, it's like it never happened," she said.

When asked to comment on the issue, Chancellor David Scott reiterated what he said to the Campus Chronicle, "anonymous acts and hate speech are acts of cowardice that will not be tolerated on this campus."

While the UMass authorities have somewhat limited resources, all incidents should be reported at once, Heller said.

In addition to reporting all incidents to the police, Heller said it is just as important to contact the Hillel house and other organizations on campus.

History refutes mascot's racial connotations

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

The protest of the University of Massachusetts Minuteman mascot is being protested because a group of students believe it symbolizes racism, sexism and oppression, but there may not be historical merit in the argument.

The American Freedom Federation began its protest last week, petitioning the mascot be changed.

Among the charges, the group claims the Minuteman represents the killing of Native Americans by local militias.

In the centuries before the American Revolution, there were attacks of colonists on the Native Americans, said Stanely Elkins, a Smith College history professor. However, the greatest clashes were during King Philip's War in the 17th century and the French and Indian War in the 18th century.

"The real horror had nothing to do with the militia," Elkins said. "The Europeans brought over diseases the Indians' immune systems could not handle and this decimated the Indian population."

By 1776 and the start of the American Revolution, the Native American population was limited in number, according to Jack Tager, a UMass history professor.

"They [the Minutemen] never had anything to do with the Indians" said Tager.

Robert Gross, the author of The Minutemen and Their World and a history professor at William and Mary College in Williamsburg, Va., said the Native Americans were trapped in a political dilemma of whom to side with: the British or the colonists.

History professor Mario Depillis said if the Native Americans were involved with the British, they were shot because of the alliance with the enemy.

Blacks also served in the state militias according to Gross. They were not equal, but many won their freedom from slavery by fighting with the Revolutionary army.

Women also were inferior in status to men, but even men did not have all the rights of citizens. One had to own property to vote, and the majority of the population could not vote, according to Tager.Gross said people want to change a symbol when they feel it excludes them, and they do not want to change a symbol if they feel the change will not include them.

Asian club to aid quake victims

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

This Thursday and Friday the South Asian Club will be collecting money and clothes to help the victims of last month's earthquake in India.

According to Sanjay Jain, president of the Club, two members, Tika Shah and Fardeen Khan, both University of Massachusetts students, approached him with the idea of setting up the table on the Campus Center Concourse.

"It was just out of our hearts," said Shah, a fifth year zoology major.

Shah said she came up with the idea while watching the news after the tragic earthquake hit. She said she felt like the club should "do something to help the people back there."

Jain said the action the club took to help out was expected.

"People tend to look at it as our responsibility," Jain said, pointing out that people have been impressed with the speed of the club's reaction.

Proceeds from monetary donations will go to fund the Red Cross and the Indian Relief Fund. All clothes and blankets donated will be sent to Air India in New York, who will transport the donations to India at no charge.

Considered India's worst earthquake in a half a century, the natural disaster leveled many villages and caused whole houses to collapse on sleeping families.

Felt at least 400 miles from the epicenter, the quake's death toll rose to over 10,000 people.

According to Jain, the earthquake hit in very rural areas so some people have not had much contact with the residents of those communities worst hit.

The club also has plans to show an Indian movie with the proceeds going towards their fundraising efforts.

The South Asian Club can only accept checks because the Board of Governors will not allow clubs to collect cash on the campus concourse for donations.

The South Asian Club is a UMass student organization which represents students with Indian, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lankin and Nepal heritage.

Started in the Spring of 1990, one of the club's major goals is to help the Indian-American students to keep in touch with their culture.

Spirituality discovered in nature

Reverand discusses importance of simple experiences

GLEN KUNENE
Collegian Correspondent

Some men say they've felt most religious at the birth of a child, making love for the first time or even walking through the woods on a beautiful day, rather than by worshiping through conventional means, said Reverand Deene Clark in his lecture, "Male Sexuality, Masculine Spirituality", at Amherst College last night.

Clark, the Protestant Religious Advisor at Amherst College and a thirty-year participant in the ordained ministry, spoke on the connections between heaven and earth and sexuality and spirituality.

By citing the Bible and several of the numerous books he has read on the subject, he said the Kingdom of God is among us as well as within us. He felt that the knowledge of this fact ought to bring about a celebration of earth and ecology along with an honoring of all creation.

People's hunger for a holy experience or Christ event, Clark said, can be satisfied by becoming aware of the manifestation of God's Kingdom around us. He illustrated this point by using two experiences in his own life when the principle became evident.

The first was last Easter when during a five hour walk in the country he came upon hundreds of frogs in the process of mating.

In the midst of this life-affirming event of lovemaking, excitement and vitality, Clark was taken by the sight. He called this his Christ Event; an experience of God on Earth.

The other was not as accidental. He was actively seeking the experience during what he called a Vision Quest. It was a three day camping trip in the Adirondacks with 14 other men.

Each man was left alone in a different part of the mountains and at the end of the trip they all reunited around a campfire to share their occurances.

He was left in solitude with nothing to do but think, remember and feel, surrounded only by God's creation.

Reflecting on these times, he said he's been closest to the kingdom of God when he's been out of his mind and into his feelings.

"It's during these experiences and lovemaking at its deepest and sometimes best that one gets closest to things holy," Clark said.

Israel, Syria deadlocked

By Barry Schweild
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of state Warren Christopher will weigh the recommendations of an advance team before deciding whether to go to the Middle East to try to break a deadlock in Israeli-Syrian negotiations, officials said Monday.

"He has said it is not so much a question whether he goes to the region, but when," said State Department spokesman Michael McCurry.

The alternative is to first reopen formal talks in Washington, but Syria has warned the Clinton administration it first wants strong indications Israel is ready to relinquish the Golan Heights.

The team headed by Dennis B. Ross of the State Department opened talks Monday in Egypt and plans to make other stops in the region before reporting to Christopher. This time he will add Tunis to his itinerary for meeting with the Palestine Liberation Organization leaders.

"It's very much one step at a time," McCurry said. "At the conclusion of this trip we will see where we are."

The administration is eager to build on Israel's agreements to with the Palestine Liberation Organization and with Jordan, but the outlook for an accord between Israel and Syria is not promising.

Syria wants Israel to return all of the Golan Heights, a strategic territory overlooking northern Israel, and has offered peace in exchange.

Israel, which has hinted it would give up at last some of the land, is unwilling to be more explicit until Syria spells out its peace offer.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on Sunday said progress with Syria could only be made in direct meetings. Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Sharaa, said again on Saturday that Syria needs assurances Israel would negotiate seriously before accepting another invitation for negotiations at the State Department.

"We are not going to the next round of sterile, irrelevant talks in Washington," Sharaa said. "We will not go to talks just for the sake of talks. But if there is any change from the Israeli side, then Syria is ready to continue negotiations in any future round."

The foreign minister also said one obstacle to peace is that Israel "is now preoccupied with the Palestinian-Israeli peace accord."

symbol," said Matt Oldham a freshman.

"A university is a marketplace of ideas and every idea should have a place," said Shomwa Shamapande, president of the Black Student Union. "However, the issues we are not addressing are the questions of financial aid and the questions of the day to day life of students at the University."

And, some think it is blown way out of proportion.

"I know that this is the valley," said sophomore Nell McGriff. "But you can go too far."

A twenty-one year old's vision of the Crazy Pizza Guy

Adam
GOULSTON

It seems customary procedure for a columnist to devote his/her designated space after his/her birthday to yet another tale of growing a year older or whatever. I just turned 21. I'm legal etc... Now I can get drunk during my lunch break. I could go on, but no sir, that's not for me.

I'd like to talk about the Crazy Pizza Guy.

Lying there in my lack of sleep, there came this vision of the man by the Antonio's sneeze-guard, pick-your-slice viewing window. He was neither old nor young, maybe late-30s.

Standing impatiently by that oh so tempting pane of Plexiglas, he shifted his weight restlessly from one foot to the other in a sort of angst-ridden march.

With a deliberate and precise downward stroke of his finger, he demanded his slice. "I want that one damnit, that one!" But it wasn't his turn. "That one with the big chunks of chicken!"

As he began to vault himself above the sneeze guard, his brow wrinkled beneath a marginally receded hairline and his face contorted with anger.

"Five dollars, I'll give you five dollars," his voice fluctuated. "No, better yet, you give me five dollars." This part confused me.

Then (and this is the weird part) his hairline began to recede as he physically grew and shrank with each new demand. Yet even with these unearthly contortions, he received no attention.

It's not unusual circumstance for the mind to transcend into abstract and absurd thought in that half-sleep stage before complete unconsciousness, but every now and then a feeling arises that beneath this imagery lies some subverted prescription on life.

Maybe I am Crazy Pizza Guy. My hairline is already receding, even if only slightly. I'm a vegetarian, but I wouldn't rule out the possibility of someday being a fan of "big chunks of chicken." And should my journalistic pursuits flounder, I may find myself remaining a denizen of the Happy Valley like the "spare change" guy.

But this is not productive thought.

My other theory is more plausible. Crazy Pizza Guy is a metaphor for the potential of disobedience. He's a portrait of disruption. But because he's a bastard he goes rightfully ignored.

Any given Friday or Saturday night when, like lemmings to the sea, the exodus from parties and bars converges on tiny Antonio's to devour pizza the instant it comes out of the oven so that it burns the roofs of their mouths. Yet they're too entirely inebriated to notice. There could be a Crazy Pizza Guy amongst them.

Admittedly, the drunk mob is rarely devoid of anarchists. Yet at the sight of pizza, they all behave like it's snack time in the first grade and Mrs. Schoenhoffer is handing out the peanut butter and crackers. I have yet to see Crazy Pizza Guy accurately personified in a real customer.

The evening before my vision, I was in an unnaturally sedate Antonio's. But I was thoroughly enjoying the ambience mainly because no one was vaulting over the sneeze guard negotiating pizza deals.

I stopped to take a moment to appreciate my own generally civil behavior and that of those around me. [Crazy Pizza Guy is purely a stranded figment of my imagination and the fact he wasn't served at Antonio's. This is in no way an attempt to discredit the restaurant's service. I have always been treated promptly and courteously, and I have only the greatest admiration for Antonio's.]

Chancellor Scott explains position

As I said Oct. 15, it would not be productive for me to continue a formal debate on the mascot at this time.

As an educational institution, it's important that we discuss ideas, and I in no way am suppressing the rights of anyone on this campus to talk about the concerns raised by some students surrounding the mascot; certainly people are free to continue the discussion.

I give the students credit for bringing up the issue of free speech — that was my original point. Independent of changing the mascot, all I wanted to do was freely discuss questions surrounding the use of symbols and what they mean to us.

Unfortunately, I was not able to provide a productive forum for this dialogue before the issue evolved into a polarizing debate over the valor of the Minuteman in securing freedom for America.

Sometime in the future, after we gain some perspective on what happened this past week, I or others on this campus will provide a formal forum in which to continue the dialogue.

David K. Scott
Chancellor, UMass

Mascot misconceptions need to be clarified

Who would have believed the issue of the Minuteman mascot would explode across campus and the nation as it has over the past few days? But now that all this has occurred, isn't it time to learn what this is really all about?

Some students at this campus, with the best of intentions, drafted a petition that included four requests. First of all, the administration must take active steps to fulfill its promise made last fall to increase ALANA representation in the undergraduate body. Secondly, the administration must work harder to provide more financial aid to poor and working class students, so that no one is denied access. Doing so will raise the percentage of ALANA students. Thirdly, the tower library must be renamed the W.E.B. Du Bois Tower Library. It would then be the first and only building on campus named after an African American, and a great choice as his papers are in the archives there, and Du Bois was a native of Great Barrington. Fourthly, the campus mascot, the Minuteman, should be reconsidered, as it offends many students.

Criticism has focused entirely on the fourth issue, possibly the least substansive. Does this mean that the other three are in the bag? If that would be the case, our work is nearly done. The aim is to raise awareness about the kind of campus we want to have. Is it a rich person's campus? Is it the White people's campus? Do the names and symbols represent who we want to be, as we approach the 21st Century?

To me, the Minuteman initially evoked good feelings. These people were the Castro-ites of the 1770s. But on another level, they were a bunch of armed White men, representing the interests of the colonialists who made war on the first Americans, leading to their near extinction.

I believe the "mascot question" is drawing the most criticism because the opposition to our other demands want to pit supporters of our sports teams against minority student demands. This way, we can be portrayed as the politically correct police, destroying valuable cultural heritage. We are not. We are raising important questions, that deserve serious consideration. And in my humble opinion, the most serious questions are about the demands relating to student access.

Are the supporters of our sports teams opposed to more state funding for the University of Massachusetts? I suppose not. But leave it to our glorious unbiased national media to twist and distort actual events. This shows that the whole media-invented issue of PC police, and PC censorship, etc. ad naseum, is a stick with which to beat back progressive demands shared by a majority of students and citizens in our country.

We all benefit from AIDS funding

I'm so delighted Michael Morrissey was able to inform us that money is being wasted "on a disease that affects people with dangerous lifestyles." Why don't we spend more money on a "more deserving disease" like. . .I don't know. . .maybe heart disease?

Tell us Michael, just how do people most often get heart disease? Oh, could it be there was too much fat and cholesterol in their diet, or maybe they smoked? Gee, that's not a lifestyle choice. Is it?

The fact is, research on AIDS has many spin-off results that benefit the treatment of a large number of illnesses. When our society invests in studying AIDS, we collect vast amounts of information about the immune system; the inadequate response of which causes the majority of diseases. Cancer is basically a failure of the immune system to identify and attack malignant cells. Infections are fought off because the immune system is able to manufacture a chemical defense that kill off the foreign pathogen. Technologies like gene therapy can be enhanced when experimenting with methods of "reprogramming" other immune cells to take over the function of the T-cells that are devastated by HIV. Auto-immune diseases like Multiple Sclerosis, Lupus, and Muscular Dystrophy can be better treated with a greater understanding about how the immune system works.

Contrary to what Morrissey contends, supporting biotechnology research and the American pharmaceutical industry in the fight against AIDS benefits our economy. It can only help our nation to become a world leader in an important and growing field.

Who are the people who have AIDS?

Well, it is true that right now a disproportionate number are people of color, gay males, and intravenous drug users. These are human beings with a fatal illness who Morrissey feels our society should essentially ignore. The impression I get from Morrissey's article is that people of color, as well as homosexuals, are probably not the type of people he would want to associate with anyway. (They're freaks who evidently "hang out on city street corners at night.")

Who are the people who will be getting AIDS in the future?

It is clear that the rate of increase for contracting AIDS is greatest among the female and heterosexual populations. I would remind Morrissey that in Central Africa, where AIDS is rampant, the disease is transmitted primarily through heterosexual sex. Also, HIV is a particularly fast-evolving contagion. There is the ever-present risk of more virulent forms of the virus developing; threatening any group of people in the world. (Morrissey would apparently only care when "important people" from the "mainstream" were threatened.

So, who benefits from AIDS research? We all do.

Michael Morrissey's article not only displays profound ignorance, but also reveals to us an insensitive nature and callous disposition that hopefully, time can eventually mend.

UMass anti-semitism increasing

In recent weeks there have been many anti-Semitic incidents on this campus, including death threats to Jewish professors and students. This campus will not tolerate this type of behavior or any other acts of hate.

There have been five documented acts of anti-Semitism in the last two weeks. In one incident, a Jewish professor walked into her classroom and saw swastikas written on her blackboard and in big letters the phrase "I will kill you."

Nazi propaganda, hate symbols and anti-Jewish graffiti have been seen on this campus for many years. Jewish students are tired of the lack of action by this campus to address these issues. Jewish students will do everything possible to combat this behavior.

Talk to your SGA senator because a motion will be coming before the Senate soon regarding this issue.

Negotiations are about to begin between Hillel and the administration concerning issues affecting Jewish students.

Anti-Semitism will not be tolerated on this campus one day longer, and you can be sure that Hillel will work vigorously on this issue.

Morrissey insults many people

I would like to respond to Michael Morrissey's column on AIDS research cutbacks [Collegian, Oct. 15]. First of all, i want to say that I value other's opinions, even when they are in opposition to my own; however, I believe Morrissey went too far by insulting so many people.

AIDS is not the common cold which you know will go away, it is much more complicated. AIDS may not be the top cause of deaths right now, but it is on the rise. If AIDS research was cut, it very well could be the top cause of deaths. It is AIDS research that has kept the numbers down.

What if there is other ways of getting AIDS that we do not yet know about? What if someone you loved got AIDS? What if one day you became infected, despite you thought you were acting safe. AIDS research money also goes to educating people about AIDS. If none of us had any education on AIDS, we would all be as ignorant as Michael Morrissey.

People with AIDS are not the scum of society. As a matter of fact, the majority of people who get AIDS are heterosexuals, ages 15-26, high school and college students. if that does not pertain to the majority of the UMass campus, than what does?

So are all people with HIV/AIDS not worthy of living? That is what Michael Morrissey seemed to be saying.

U.S. embargo efforts ignored by Haiti

By David Beard
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — Haiti's military defied an approaching midnight deadline to yield power Monday and belittled a U.N. arms and oil embargo.

Its right wing supporters warned that any American invaders will go home "in bags."

Rightists mixed threats against the outside world with gifts of chrysanthemums to foreign reporters, while Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras suggested new talks on his departure. The United States said Cedras was only stalling.

An army broadcast urged Haitians not to worry about the U.N.-authorized embargo or the U.S. warships steaming offshore to enforce it.

The measures are aimed at forcing the return of Jean Dertrand Aristide, Haiti's first democratically elected president.

The capitol was quiet, and some small shops opened despite calls from a variety of groups calling for a shutdown of business activity.

Few cars lined up at gas stations ahead of the cutoff of oil imports. Stanley Schrager, a U.S. Embassy spokeman, said Cedras must honor the U.N. mediated pact he signed in July to return Aristide, who was ousted in a bloody coup two years ago.

He was widely popular among Haiti's impoverished masses, but opposed by the nation's elite and other conservative factions.

Many Haitians have fled the capital, fearing violence by army supported Aristide opponents or a possible intervention by U.S. forces.

Schrager said: "I'm not saying that a military intervention is imminent, but clearly there is always that risk."

He said American officials were considering providing guards for Aristide backed Prime Minister Robert Malval.

Army Lt. Col. Jean Robert Cabriel urged Haitians not to flee the capital and said the army would maintain control.

An aide at army headquarters said Cedras was not available to comment on the U.S. Embassy's statements.

"We accuse the Aristide Malval government of having threatened this government with arms ... by collaborating with foreign forces," said former Sen. Reynald Georges.

Georges congratulated Cedras for not resigning and thanked U.S. Gen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., and Sam Nunn, D-Calif., for opposing greater American involvement in Haiti.

A group behind pierside demonstrations last week that kept a U.S. warship from docking as part of a U.N. mission sought to present a gentler side Monday by handing out flowers to foreign reporters at a news conference.

Later, far right sociologist Jacquelin Montalvo Despeignes said he had a message for Washington: "If you send boys, they will go back, in bags."

Such threats led to the evacuation of hundreds of U.N. personnel, and recommendations by Canada and Belgium for their citizens to leave.

About 9,000 American citizens did not get similar warnings and very few foreigners were seen at the airport Monday.

After the departure Saturday of the U.S. members of what was to have been a 1,600 member U.N. force to retrain police and help rebuild the economy, the only U.S. troops in the contry were approximately 45 Marines guarding the U.S. Embassy. About 30 Marines came Saturday to beef up security.

Clinton to decide on force

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Facing efforts to retrict his authority to send troops to Haiti, President Clinton said Monday he would oppose any congressional curbs on his foreign policy powers. He asserted that he alone "must make the ultimate decision" on when to use force.

"I think it's a mistake to cut those decisions off in advance," the President said.

Clinton also tightened pressure on Haitian military and police officials blamed for blocking the return of deposed President Jean Dertrand Aristide. He froze any assests they might have in the United States and denied them entry into this country.

The President indicated he was not about to order U.S. forces to Haiti unless Americans there were threatened. "Keep in mind, as we speak, the Haitian government has not asked for that," Clinton said.

The President with foreign policy advisers on the crisis in Haiti as the administration fought off attempts in Congress to limit his powers.

"This is a time to be very steady," Secretary of State Warren Christopher said. "This is not a time to let the emotion of the moment affect and erode the fundamental separation of pwers which has been important for the United States for a long, long time."

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., was preparing an amendment that would require congressional authorization before the president could commit troops to Haiti, except for reasons of national security.

Dole's proposal highlighted deep congressional unhappiness over Clinton's words and actions concerning Bosnia, Somalia and Haiti.

Democrats and Republicans alike complain that the president has failed to articulate a clear plan for dealing with global problems.

In a letter to Dole and Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, Clinton expressed "grave concern" about possible amendments.

"I am fundamentally opposed to amendments which improperly limit my ability to perform my constitutional duties as commander in chief, which may have unconstitutional provisions and which, if adopted, could weaken the confidence of our allies in the United States."

In his letter, Clinton objected specifically to Dole's proposal as well as two other amendments, one banning U.S. troops from operating under U.N. command and the other restricting funds for Bosnia unless specifically authorized by Congress.

Judies offers students host of creativity

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

If you have not been to Judie's restaurant since its menu change two months ago, or if you have never been there at all, a trip to this Pleasant Street eatery will prove a unique dining experience unmatched anywhere.

"I like to be known for creating," says Judie, the enthusiastic owner who can be found floating around the dining room, making cheerful conversation with first-time diners or catching up with favorite customers on any given night.

In addition to making sure customers are satisfied, and even busing tables, Judie dreams up and creates mouth-watering "different renditions" of traditional international dishes, sometimes resulting in what Judie calls "weird things," often "gooey, messy and delicious."

Having won The Advocate's 1993 award for "Best Creative Food in the Valley," Judie is known for creating combinations of tastes and tidbits not commonly found. Her new menu boasts such morsels as pulpy potato skins (loaded with vegetables, meats and enough cheese and spices to keep even the most finicky taste buds and hearty appetites happy), a buttery, light seafood bisque which puts Judies on the map as "the place to go for bisque when you're in Amherst" from as far away as California. The first poppyseed salad dressing to come to this area, a doughy popover with a tangy apple butter and a number of dishes featuring every distinguished taste from cilantro pesto to tangy teriyaki.

"I will never eat a cheese sandwich," Judie asserts, explaining that flavor combos just seem to come to her, and enhance the unique dishes on her menu. She adds that one of her favorite aspects of the job is she is able to approach customers that look confused and overwhelmed upon first sight of the expanded menu, and recommending a dish depending on what kind of meal the patron is in the mood for. The outgoing owner, smiling, describes customers who order as soon as they come in, without trying something new as "no fun."

Judie recommended that I try the Southwestern Filet Mignon, a scrumptious, large portion of filet mignon and sauteed peppers with bacon and cilantro pesto, covered with a blanket of melted mozzarella cheese, served over a bed of angel hair pasta smothered in a sweet, spicy sauce.

Preceding the main dish, I confess to indulging in seafood bisque (worthy of its fabulous reputation,) a one-half order of potato skins, a one-half Ceasar salad (the best that I have ever tasted, and believe me, I have eaten more salads than I care to recall in my time) that I have yet to stop craving, and the famous popover. The filet mignon dish filled me to capacity, but I can't say that, flavor-wise, I ever got bored.

The atmosphere at Judie's is cozy and friendly, but is often misconstrued as being formal. Judie claims that many people, college students in particular, are often turned-off by what they perceive as a being, quiet, stifling, fancy or posh setting.

The reality is that Judie and her staff do a fabulous job at making all patrons feel at home, and the hand-painted tables (bravo to University of Massachusetts MFA student Gau Wen Tang who designed them) soft lighting, vivacious plants and knick-knacks from all over the world (a paricular wood elephant is almost as well-known as Judie is) are there to create a homey atmosphere.

Furthermore, Judie realizes the importance of student clientele in Amherst, and wants to be known as a great place to hang out and enjoy some food, not just somewhere to take parents or dates.

"It's funny, because often people will be dragged in by there wives or girlfriends. Then they realize that it's not just a watercress sandwich restaurant," she says.

Although her meals are substantial, they're not too filling. This is part of her "lunch for dinner and dinner for lunch" theory that both large and lighter meals should be and are available to her customers at all times of the day.

"I want a wow experience," Judie explains of the way her customers react to dining at her restaurant. In light of the amazing new menu, extremely reasonable prices (lunch specials are $3.99 every day) and super-friendly atmosphere, "wow" is definitely one word that easily comes to mind.

Judies, 253-3491 is located at 51 North Pleasant Street, next to Barselotti's.

Jazzmatazz at Pearl st.

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Correspondent

As a small child growing up in South Chicago during the 1970s, I unfortunately didn't understand and thus grew irritated with the jazz and soul music that constantly surrounded me. In those days, anyone who favored Miles Davis over The Bee Gees I thought was crazy. Still, Miles wouldn't go away. And as I hit adolescence, I became scornfully critical of jazz, hip-hop, and soul, promoting rock, and this thing called "rap". Not having any idea that, of course, that rap nor rock couldn't have ever existed without their aforementioned predecessors.

Finally, years later, I "acquired" a taste for jazz. No longer able to deny rap and hip-hop's roots, it was the jazz samples on all of my favorite records that led me to explore the music composed by the great trumpet players. Yet there was something missing. As great as the 'Birth of Cool', and 'A Love Supreme' were powerful pieces of music carrying enough emotional fortitude to bring some to their knees. The shift in genre, even the production and sound quality left me disappointed.

Enter Jazzmatazz guru, a.k.a Keith Elam, on a temporary vacation, from his better known Gang Starr. He has succeeded in fusing hip-hop and jazz. Amidst major reservations he has managed to bring to harmony two musical mediums that on paper seem like they would be horribly beating the (expletive) out of each other. Jazz purists need not run for the hills for this outfit is sure to at least put a grin of satisfaction on the most skeptical. And Elam wouldn't have even laid down one track if he didn't feel he was truly creating something true to heart: it had to be done right!

So with the help of trumpeter and be-bop virtuoso Donald Byrd, Brandford Marsalis, singers D.C. Lee and M.C. Solaar (who actually dispells the myth that French and hip-hop don't mix), Elam puts together an impressive group of people, having them perform on the tracks he sees fit.

The greatest achievement with his Jazzmatazz project is that he blends elements that would have inevitably crossed paths, and preserves that flavor, that quality about be-bop that makes it what it is, without compromising its integrity. Sexy, alluring melodies roam free against a background of heavy beats and breaks. Those interested in learning more about jazz and hip-hop will benefit from this concert.

In order to understand something from the past, be it music, literature, art, anything, an analogy has to be made taken from something in the present. If Elam can get some kids to take a look at the "real" old school and reevaluate what that means, so they can better understand the music of their heritage, he's succeeded.

Jazzmatazz will play Northampton's Pearl Street tonight. Call 584-7771 for show time and ticket info.

Vintage Vinyl sale is hit on Amherst

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Thousands of records, compact discs and cassettes decorated the grassy stretch of the Amherst Town Common this past weekend as public radio station WFCR held its third annual "Vintage Vinyl—the Used Record Sale."

"This is the biggest special event we do," said Rena Fischer, the station's development director. "We had over 45,000 records here this morning. The last two years we made $20 thousand, but we've already made about $28 thousand the first day this year."

All proceeds of the sale go to funding WFCR's operating budget and general costs.

Four large tents dominated the scene, housing the enormous stock of discs that Fischer and the rest of the staff had managed to sort and file, while dozens of stray boxes of donated music lay strewn here and there, just waiting to be picked though.

"About 10 percent of what's here comes from WFCR's library, and the rest is pretty much all donations," Fischer said. "Our biggest donation ever was about 9,000 records from a collector who passed away and his wife didn't want to have to move them."

The bright, pretty-decent-for-mid-October weather enticed hundreds of people of all ages, many among the station's 124,000 weekly listeners, to the event. Hey, everyone loves a sale, especially at a mere two bucks a pop!

There was also a general raffle for a $250 gift certificate to Sound N' Music in Northampton.

"All these people are here to buy records, a supposedly dead technology outmoded by CDs," said Howie Fogel, an avid collector for 31 years with between 3,000 and 3,500 discs to his name. "CDs sound better because the turntable is the single worst stereo component of all time, and it doesn't matter how good the recording is, it'll sound terrible. This is a marvelous opportunity to buy any kind of recording at a really good price."

WFCR, which is the national public member radio station in New England, won a national award for "Best Special Event in the Public Radio System" in 1992, given by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

"It's a big event, and we're really proud of the award," Fischer said as countless satisfied people shuffled past, bags containing songs long-searched for in hand. "It takes dozens of people to sort all the titles we get, but we have a core of a dozen to 15, both staff and volunteers, who've helped make this event a success."

Fischer said that any University of Massachusetts student wishing to volunteer for special events or fund-raising should call Karin Obermeier at 545-0100 at the Hampshire House on campus.

The station plays mostly classical music throughout the day with jazz on weekday evenings. It also has news and informational segments like Morning Edition and All Things Considered. Of the four tents, two were devoted sheerly to classical and opera tastes.

"Certainly there are fewer kids buying classical music, but there are some college-aged people in those tents," she said. "We have something for everyone, regardless of age or preference.

"Cassette tapes just deteriorate significantly. You just couldn't play a song a hundred times over and have it last. Some people just prefer records for their size, feel and sound."

WRITE FOR ARTS

Empty action makes for weak Judgement

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Remember a year back and the release of a little-seen action film Trespass. In that film, two Arkansas firefighters get mixed up with an entourage of illicit "business associates" in the St. Louis inner city arena. As banal as the plot appeared, the film was driven by an intelligent screenplay about greed and crisp direction by Walter Hill. As for that film's current urban mimic, the Emilio Estevez vehicle Judgement Night, this film exists merely to detail all the wrong tracks Trespass could have taken.

Judgement Night as directed by Brit action maven Stephen Hopkins (Predator II) is, in Robert Altman's Player terms, Bonfire of the Vanities meets the atore-mentioned Trespass.

The story begins promisingly enough as Hopkins' camera lovingly glides across an autumnal suburban landscape. Piles of leaves adorn every uniform; six-figure house and children frolic in the sun-drenched afternoon.

Sean Estevez and buddies Mike (Cuba Gooding Jr.) John (Stephen Dorff) and Ray (Jeremy Piven) exit their domestic paradise for the girder strewn alleyways of Chicago, en route to their front row fight night seats. Taking a wrong turn they mistakenly rundown a wounded man, witness a gangland slaying and raise the ire of local crime boss Farron (Denis Leary) who rants and raves his stilted monologue at an energy level absent from the rest of the film.

Cuba Gooding Jr. as seen in Gladiator.

Emilio Estevez in Walt Disney pictures The Mighty Ducks.

What Night essentially boils down to is one long, extended foot chase. Hopkins stumbles across the old fashioned street beat and never lets it go. Monotonously he fills the screen with images of Emilio and gang running, with Leary and gang in pursuit, with shadows of Emilio and gang running and with shadows of ... well, you get the picture. The film ends up playing like a Beginners' Track instructional video.

As for the story, neither Hopkins nor the script spend enough time on the principle characters to garner any sympathy for their plight as they flee the murderous advances of Leary and the goons. Estevez is seen early on with wife and child. He consistently banters about how he "will get home to (his) wife tonight," but his character is such a non-descript yuppie that one could care less about his newly awakened paternal desires. The action is so weak that you almost wish Leary's Farron would start blasting away at the lightly sketched stereotypes that make up Estevez' group.

The troublesome brother coming to terms with Estevez; the lady killer without a serious bone in his libido; the fast talking wise guy, and the devoted family man whose wife Leary will surely "pay a visit to" once he's dead. Yes, the gang's all here. And, as the bullets pour forth in volleys, the stereotypes get painted with broader strokes.

Action fans will be disappointed with Judgement Night. The film tends to drag, Leary's character has no true motive for hunting down the group (especially once his gang has been systematically decimated) and it doesn't take long before the viewer begins to question why Estevez and buddies don't just run out of town. Du Bois: Beyond the Color Line and Class

"The problem of the twentieth century," stated W.E.B. Du Bois in 1903, "is the problem of the color-line, the relation of the darker to the lighter races of men in Asia and Africa, in America and the islands of the sea."

Shyamla Ivatury &
COLIN CAVELL

Fifty years later, Du Bois realized that racism was a tool, an insidious tool utilized to divide and conquer, and that material gain and class domination lay at its roots.

"I still think today as yesterday that the color line is a great problem of this century," he said in his book, The Souls of Black Folk. "But today I see more clearly than yesterday that back of the problem of race and color, lies a greater problem which both obscures and implements it: and that is the fact that so many civilized persons are willing to live in comfort even if the price of this is poverty, ignorance and disease of the majority of their fellowmen; that to maintain this privilege men have waged war until today war tends to become universal and continuous, and the excuse for this war continues largely to be color and race.

The color line, race and the promotion of the idea that one race is superior to another is still utilized today to incite, divide and conquer, from South Africa to Los Angeles, from Somalia to Miami, and in each instance, racism is used as a cover to hide exploitation and material gain, class domination and imperialism.

From his birth in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1868 to his death in Ghana in 1963, Du Bois was a beacon, a Prometheus, an intellectual giant born into an area of the world which rejected his skin color and, ultimately, his person.

Not content to live as a second-class citizen, Du Bois dedicated his life to fighting the injustice done against all African peoples in the diaspora by their White brethren, firmly laying claim to every privilege and duty which was the right of a free people.

Understanding that racism was a tool and not an end in itself, Du Bois likewise fought for the rights of workers, women and others, of all races, whose lives were conditioned by structural oppression, structures which served the interests of a few at the expense of the many.

Claims of caste and class prejudice were ruthlessly attacked and exposed for the tools of manipulation, oppression and undeserved benefit for which they were utilized. The haughty demeanor of the conniving parvenu and the cynical disposition of the blue-blooded aristocrat were fair game for this David among Goliaths. But beyond his essays and sketches in The Souls of Black Folk and his social commentaries in Crisis magazine lay his sociological works which included The Suppression of the African Slave Trade and The Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study.

The University of Massachusetts is honored to house the collected works of this scholar, organizer, activist, Pan-Africanist, writer, journalist, publisher and poet in the University tower library. The movement which has organized a petition drive around the issue of naming the tower library in honor of W.E.B. Du Bois is to be commended and supported, and their petition deserves the serious consideration and positive action by the Adminstration, the Board of Trustees, and the state legislature which it is due.

As members of the coalition which is behind this drive, we offer every student, faculty, staff and administrator along with every campus union and organization the opportunity to sign this petition. And as co-signers, we welcome you to the struggle for a new university, one which reflects the cultural diversity of a new world.

The true history of the 'Minuteman'

America by the limited definition and legacy passed down from the "Minuteman" is the America of the property owning, "free," White male, only. This legacy is one of exclusion and privilege for the few property owning White males with oppression and denial for the vast majority of others. This tradition is a by-product of the past which has worked to correct itself in our own historical period.

Sharon
COUSIN

Many feel that without the Minuteman America would not exist. Many feel that we have a debt to the Minuteman for the freedom we now enjoy. But we could just as easily claim that without the genocide of millions of Indians, we would not have America. Similarly, we could just as easily say that without the enslavement of millions of Black Africans, we would not have America.

This is the truth that goes unacknowledged in the statements we have heard of late which claim that we owe the Minuteman a great debt. When we utter sentimental statements evoking the Minuteman history, we are engaging in a historical fallacy and in the mythology of America.

What the privileging and glorification of the Minuteman history leaves out is the truth of who really fought the American Revolution and whose freedom was won. The Minutemen were a reserve army, in whose rank were found White male between the ages of 16 and 60. They were property owners with the right to vote as resident member of a particular town for at least one year. The Minutemen were a militia whom General George Washington distrusted, especially after 6,000 of them deserted following the Battle of Long Island. General Washington found the Minutemen incompetent and unreliable in battle and wanted instead a standing army to succesfully fight the war.

The Minutemen were not formed solely to fight the revolution. Distributed throughout the thirteen colonies from Marylnd to Massachusetts, the Minutemen were used to quash slave rebellions and Indian uprisings. Because of the serious threat these conflicts presented to the fledgling colonies and the utter inadequacy of the Minutemen, General George Wachington came to rely on the Continental Army, the latter made up mostly of freed and runaway slaves and poor White men, many from the debtor prisons or indentured servents. These men were directed to fight for the freedom of a priviledged class of White merchants and property owners.

From this true history, one can see that the American Revolution was a poor mans's war, but fought in the interest of wealthy men. An exemption system operating at the time allowed wealthy White men to buy their way out of having to fight or allowed them to substitute another in their place, the latter being comprised predominantly from the ranks of Blacks and indentured White males too poor to buy a sideline seat at the revolution.

A good illustration is seen in the example provided by the entire White male population in the town of Epping, N.H., which declared themselves exempt under this system. There was also a bounty for service promised to a poor war veteran which he never received, because the bounty went right in to the pockets of the property owners to whom they were indebted.

This early American history is of great importance, as it sets a precedent for the many wars fought by the United States with a disproportionate number of Blacks and Latinos and poor White males who filled the ranks of the enlisted men still yearning to be free. This is why, on closer scrutiny, we find the historical idealization of the "minuteman" somewhat problematic

Massachussetts does, however, have a history for which it can be truly proud of. It was the home of the abolitionist crusade. Some of the greatest heroes and champions of freedom were residents or natives of Massachussetts, among whom we can count Harriett Tubman, Sojourner truth, Frederick Douglass and William Lloyd Garrison. Garrison, a White man, founded the American Anti-Slavery Society and published the Liberator newspaper. Twenty years prior to the civil War, Garrison wrote the following:

"Resolved, that the Church of Christ, like its head, has never held a slave—has never apologized for slavery—has never known a slaveholder as one of its members—has never stopped its ear to the cry of the poor—has never received the plunder of the poor with which to spread the gospel, circulate the Bible, publish tracts, or to establish Sunday schools; and has never held within its embrace dumb dogs which will not bark against the wrongs which crush humanity; the American Church, which perpetuates all these enormous crimes, is not the Church of Christ..."

Holding to the legacy of the Minuteman is holding to the idea of exclusion, priviledge for some and oppression and denial for others. Holding on the this legacy reflects a resistance to change and a failure to recognize the importance of such change.

Their is a past that is present in our own mascot, and it affects our thinking in subtle ways. It hints that the only authentic American is, after all is said and done, a priviledged White male. This hint symbolized in the Minuteman mascot affects our character our minds and our day-to-day choices. It puts a censor on free speech and forces us to have second thoughts about this "diversity" thing is thrown round as a characterization of this University.

Symbols are important to the ordering of consciousness, and thus we can attest to the positive impact of the burning torch of liberty and the stars and stripes of the American flag or to the negative impact of the burning cross of the Ku Klux Klan and the stars and bars of the flag of the Confederacy.

Those of us involved in this movement would prefer a mascot that is inclusive and reflective of the true history of America, one in which all of the University's community can take pride in since it is oppose to represent where we are at now and points us in the direction we seek to be in the future. And while a few replacement suggestions are being talked about of present, let me offer one which holds popularity amongst the members of our coalition, -"The Liberators," symbolized by the burning torch of liberty.
This is one suggestion with which we request this be open to debate.

Petition:
In order to serve the goals of multiculturalism, diversity and accessibility, we the undersigned at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst demand the following:

1. Keep the pledge made to the African-American, Latin American, Asian American and Native American (ALANA) students in the Fall of 1992 by increasing the enrollment of ALANA students to 20 percent at the undergraduate level, and push for a similar percentage at the graduate level.
2. Increase the availability of acholarships for economically disadvantaged students.
3. Name the Tower Library after the African American educator, scholar, organizer and leader, W.E.B. Du Bois.
4. Change the UMass mascot and University symbol from the "Minuteman" to a more appropriate symbol which reflects cultural and gender diversity representative of this institution of higher learning.

WAR: An Inevitable Consequence

By Felicia Cousins
Collegian Staff

The Life of Hundreds is of equal if not greater worth than that of a Few Good Men.

In memory of over 700 Somali citizens massacred in Mogadishu on and before Oct. 10, here a few words written by Haille Selassie I, in 1968, that have the same fundamental meaning today that they had when first written. History repeats itself once again.

"Until the philosophy that holds one race superior and another inferior is finally and permanently discredited and abandoned.

That until there are no longer first and second class citizes of any nation,... I've got to say war.

Until the color of a man's skin is of no more significance than the color of his eyes,... I've got to say war.

That until there basic human rights is equally guaranteed to all without regard to race

That until that day the dream of lasting peace world citizenship and the rule of international morality will remain in but a fleeting illusion to be pursued but never attained.

And, until the ignoble and unhappy regime that now hold our brothers in Angola, in Mozambique, South Africa in Sub-human bondage, have been toppled utterly destroyed

That until that day the African continent will not know peace."

Welfare cheated

Weld aims for welfare dodgers

BY ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William Weld continued his assault on the state's welfare system, announcing steps Monday aimed at cutting fraud, but administration officials don't know the extent of welfare cheating in the state.

Weld filed a bill allowing the state to attach the wages of people who refuse to repay welfare overpayments, or checks issued to unqualified recipients. The state also could deduct money owed from state tax returns.

"We're sending the posse after welfare cheats. Welfare frauds and cheats are costing Massachusetts taxpayers millions of dollars a year and we intend to do something about it," he said.

Weld said that, according to records, the state had paid out $100 million in fraudulent welfare claims in the past 10 years. Health and Human Services Secretary Charles Baker said 3 percent of individuals or families receiving welfare are not eligible but these are not necessarily fraudulent claims.

Weld and Baker did not know the fraud rate among welfare recipients in Massachusetts.

"We don't think it's an epidemic," said Public Welfare Commissioner Joseph Gallant.

"There are no firm numbers on what the exact amount of fraud is, but any amount of fraud is too much," Gallant said.

Weld's press conference was his third in six days on welfare reform and fraud. He filed a reform bill in April that would, among other steps, require long term welfare recipients to perform community service or get a part time job.

Rep. Mark Roosevelt, a candidate for governor, said Weld's interest in welfare could be a sign the governor was cranking up his election campaign. While saying he agreed with most of Weld's welfare reform proposals, he questioned the governor's motives.

"He puts out a whole lot of stuff and lets it float out into the air," said Roosevelt, D-Boston. "This is a very popular issue, no doubt about it ... he's not pushing an agenda forward. He's more interested in holding press conferences than getting something done."

A great American poet – winner of every major prize America can offer its poets, from the Pulitzer to the Bollingen - will be here during Homecoming Weekend at 4 p.m. on Friday, October 22.

The memoir's central thread is Merrill's thirty-month sojourn in Europe. A youth of twenty-four, born to comfort and privilege, and now at a crossroads, he sets sail in 1950, with a young man's passionate expectations. Having sold his first book of poems, having recently met ("or so I thought") the love of his life, yet beginning to feel constrained by his social circles, and seeing no way into the next phase of his life, he envisions himself returning from his travels "a different person." His vivid stories of encounters across Europe — with friends and lovers, with great cities, with great works of art, with opera, with psychoanalysis, with artists and aristocrats — are followed by postscripts reaching back to childhood and forward towards the present and the person he is. His memoir enthralls as a revelation of a poet's life, as a portrayal of the complexities that bind a son to his parents, and as perhaps the most lucid and inward account we have had of a homosexual life in a world of intellect and art. A fascinating work. A literary event.

Men's X-C makes strides at conference meet

by Michael R. DiLorenzo
Collegian Staff

Despite sitting nine of their best runners, the Massachusetts men's cross country team took second place in the nine-team Eastern Conference Meet at New Britain, Conn. Keene St. won the meet with 23 points while UMass finished with 80.

Junior Rick Copley paced the Minutemen placing 10th with a time of 27:07. It was not an unfamiliar place for Copley, who finished first for the Minutemen in this meet last year.

"I'm not surprised because Rick was our top runner here last year," said Coach Ken O'Brien. "We knew if he had the type of day he is capable of, he would be our top runner."

Coming off a tough race at the Paul Short Invitational, where UMass faced 12 nationally ranked teams, O'Brien rested his top runners with an eye on this weekend's Atlantic-10 Championships.

"We were coming off a tough race," O'Brien said. "This was akin to a team that qualifies for the playoffs early resting its top players down the stretch. We have a young team that needed to take a step back and rest. We wanted to see how the others would respond, and they responded very well."

O'Brien was particularly pleased with the improvement of the Minutemen over their results from last year's Eastern Conference Meet. Copley improved from 17th place to 10th place, sophomore Jonah Backstrom, who finished third for Umass, improved from 41st to 15th, and sophomore Pat Murphy, the Minutemen's 7th finisher, went from 60th to 39th. Overall, UMass improved 77 points over their total of 157 last year. However it was sophomore Ryan Autry, who finished second for the Minutemen, that O'Brien singled out."

"Ryan has probably shown the most growth of anyone on the team from this point last year, both mentally and physically," O'Brien said.

Autry worked particularly hard during the summer to prepare for this season, O'Brien said.

"He really went home and did his homework. I am very impressed by his determination and maturity," O'Brien said. "Although he usually goes unnoticed, he could be our surprise runner over the next three weeks."

Rounding out UMass' top five were freshman Jason Brewer (fourth), who placed 20th overall, and sophomore Walter Stock (fifth), who was 22nd.

UMass will see action again Saturday when they travel to Washington, D.C., for the A-10 Championships. O'Brien feels the Minutemen will be battling St. Joseph's for second place.

"West Virginia is number one in the A-10 and 15th in the nation, so they are the decided favorite," O'Brien said. "We [UMass-St. Joe's] have flip-flopped in the rankings all year. We are dead-even teams. Their top two runners have an edge, but our depth turns the tables after that. If we can split up their top two, it will be a bonus."

■ boring

sion. Plus, at 84 games, the regular season is too long to attempt to wage such battles. Consequently, the league cannot try to replicate the feel of a playoff game during an ordinary regular-season contest.

What the NHL needs is a format that will:

A) End the game and produce a winner.

B) Get the kids home in time for bed.

C) Give the fans their money's worth.

One solution already in use in the International Hockey League, is a shootout (penalty-shot) format. If a game ends in a tie, and the five-minute OT period can't decide the contest, each team picks five players to take breakaways at the opposing goalie. If the game is tied after that, each team gets one point. However, if a winner emerges, that team gets two points, while the loser still gets one.

While the five-minute OT should still be played, if it ends tied, the NHL should mandate that each team pick only three players for the shootout. If the first shootout ends tied, a second ensues. If the second ends tied, the game ends. If one team wins, points would be awarded using the IHL system, though goals scored during the shootout would not be counted toward a player's season stats.

This gives the league the best opportunity to decide all games. By selecting only three players, they are likely getting the three best scorers on a given team. It is a better solution, because the game can end sooner. It is hockey's ultimate test of skill. By featuring a shootout, the NHL creates a slam-dunk-type contest and draws more fans. Finally, by awarding a point to the loser of a shootout, it appeases the weaker teams in the league who need points.

The new OT format would serve to spice up five-minute OT sessions.

"Look at the crowd that showed up tonight," said Coach Yarworth. "We could easily fill a building every game on campus."

The Minutemen's record now stands at 14-3. UMass will travel to West Point on October 25 to play Army.

The Minutewomen have a match against A-10 leader George Washington and number two Temple in a one week span. For the remainder of the season the Minutewomen's schedule is much kinder however, with a considerable number of home games. (UMass has had only four home matches to this point) They will be playing some less potent, but equally competitive foes and this could prove to be a very productive time for UMass.

The Minutewomen return to action tonight when they face Fairfield at 7:00 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage. Admission is free.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Secure your valuables in a safe place. Inspiration comes in mid-morning. Jot down original ideas. A romantic reconciliation could put you in a euphoric mood.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): New skills will help you move up the career ladder. Who you know can affect your professional and social success. Use tact when mediating a family feud. A compromise works better than expected.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You could land a lucrative contract. Someone you meet for the first time will play a major role in your future happiness. Be more sympathetic to an unlucky relative.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): It is all right to be tough in business as long as you are thoroughly professional. A consulting job brings extra cash to pay urgent bills. Settle accounts with a family member.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Nobody can propel you ahead like yourself. It is not necessary for success to stop just because you are retiring. A child will learn an important lesson if you step aside for one.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A whole new world awaits you once you get off the fence and make a decision. The results are amazing! Keep your energy level high.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Others may try to enlist your help with a political cause. Think carefully before going ahead with this. Spend more time with someone contined indoors.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Have confidence in yourself and other will follow suit. You and an older individual enjoy special rapport. The love bug could bite tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Good news from afar arouses your enthusiasm. Your efforts to stir up action will bring new profits. Getting in touch with a long-lost friend could lead to romance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You may have to work harder to prove yourself. Involvement in a community project will give you a higher profile. Romance sizzles!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your uneasiness regarding a personal matter will evaporate today. Avoid jumping the gun or you could jeopardize an exciting opportunity. Postpone a romantic interlude.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): An academic program may hold special appeal. Use your good sense when handling a private matter. Your social life may be interfering with your employment responsibilities.

Men's intramural soccer playoff races tighten

By ERIC LEBOFF
Collegian Correspondent

If the thirty men intramural soccer squads at the University of Massachusetts were viewed as a dense forest of teams, then it stands to reason that would be more firmly rooted than others. Cowls Bowels, Zoom, and Bob are like sequoias, standing tall and mighty against their opponents. Others display less power, but are still hard to cut down.

The Brook League boasts two powerhouse teams. One of them, Cowls Bowels (4-0-0), is a good bet to take this year's championship.

"As a whole we have a good team. Each individual has his part", said captain Marc Richards.

The second sequoia in the Brook League is Zoom, captained by Matt Goldstein. He feels his squad is very competitive, and extends special praise toward his cat-like goalie, Chris Gilbert. Many of the players on Zoom have been together since high school, and this is evident from their adept passing skills. If this tree has any weak roots, it would be insufficient conditioning, which Goldstein fears may hurt them.

Adding some fire to the Arctic League is Bob. Currently at 2-0-1, Bob boasts an arsenal of offensive weapons. Their biggest gun may be Eric Sloan, who finds the net with regularity.

"We are probably one of the best teams around", says captain Lyle Core. Though he says Bob's team play needs some work.

Other trees in the forest may cast less of a shadow on their opponents, but are still worthy of mention. Sigma Phi Epsilon A (2-1-0) is a gritty, aggressive team coached by Al Tylis. A true, blue collar team, what they lack in talent they more than make up for with sweat and hard work. Lacking top stars has not kept Sigma Phi Epsilon from blossoming. Everyone takes turns being the hero.

Also branching out is Kolovara, another competent team from the Arctic division. Focusing on defense, Kolovara has put together a 2-0-1 record, and have proven to be difficult to uproot.

"Every time we play together we get better at coordinating our efforts", says captain Alex Manias.

The most impressive teams in this forest seem to be Cowls Bowels, Zoom, and Bob. Sigma Phi Epsilon A and Kolovara are growing in stature, however, and may soon tower skyward. The playoffs are just around the bend, and will leave only one team standing.

HOUSING EXEMPTION APPLICATIONS

Frosh, Sophomores and Stockbridge students who wish to live off-campus for the Spring 1994 semester should apply for an exemption from the Board of Trustee regulation governing on-campus living. Applications are now available in the Housing Assignment Office, 235 Whitmore. Exemption applications are due no later than Friday, Oct. 29th, 1993. Please submit all applications to the Housing Assignment Office.

IMPORTANT NOTES: PLEASE READ CAREFULLY

 The Exemption Committee will only meet ONCE. This is the only opportunity you will have to apply for off-campus permission for the spring 1994 semester. Please make sure you apply in time.

 Signing a lease in not valid grounds for receiving an exemption from the on-campus housing requirement. DO NOT SIGN A LEASE UNTIL YOU RECEIVE AN EXEMPTION. Any student who signs a lease without prior approval from the Exemption Committee and the Housing Assignment Office is responsible for all on-campus fees and will be required to reside on-campus. Thank you.

Minutemen capture NE water polo championship

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Correspondent

In front of about 200 screaming University of Massachusetts fans at Amherst College, the water polo team defeated their rivals from Brown University 10 to 9 Saturday night. They went on to beat Iona Sunday winning the New England Water Polo Championships.

The No. 13 ranked UMass men's water polo team went undefeated in three games to win their second straight New England Championship. The team's toughest match was their third game of the day against Brown.

"Brown is our New England rivals," said Junior Javier Gonzalez. The game would come down to the very last second, as a shot by Brown was deflected and the UMass squad came away with a hard fought victory.

"We ran out of gas in the fourth quarter," head coach Russ Yarworth said. "After the first two games the team was worn out, but the whole team played well. We really came together tonight."

The Minutemen also defeated Boston College 21 to 2 and Harvard 16 to 11. The 16 to 11 victory over Iona the next day gave UMass the Championship.

Sophomore Luis Limardo lead the team with 21 goals in four games. Javiear Gonzalez, the 1992 New England Most Valuable Player, and senior co-captain Tasan Engin each tallied six goals against Iona.

"We played with a lot of intensity," said Captain Tasan Engin. "The crowd really pushed us."

The large crowd Saturday night showed the strong support for the UMass water polo team. It rose the ques-

Minutemen continue win streak on the road

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team pushed its winning streak to four with wins at St. Bonaventure and Siena this past weekend. The Minutemen made strong second half comebacks in both contests, putting up their first two road wins of the year.

UMass rallied from a 2-1 halftime deficit to defeat the Bonnies 4-2 on Saturday. The win closes the Atlantic 10 season for the Minutemen with a 3-4 record. They still have a outside shot to qualify for the A-10 tournament.

"You never know what can happen, we can make the tournament if a few crazy things happen," said coach Sam Koch.

On Sunday UMass defeated Siena 2-1, again coming back after being down at the half. Senior Randy Jacobs netted the winner and has stated that the team is now more focused after being inconsistent for most of the year.

"We know we just have to win from here on out, and we'll take it one game at a time," said Jacobs.

A win at St. Bonaventure was imperative to keep the tournament hopes alive. The Bonnies opened the scoring only 6:30 into the game, when Jim Ciolek scored off of a feed from Jon Swialkowski.

At 25:15 UMass' forward Justin Edelman was able to put in a Colin Johnson pass to knot the score. less than five minutes later the Bonnies went back on top with an unassisted goal from Nevln Curpen. The Minutemen's season came down to the second half.

UMass simply dominated the second half. Kevin Martin re-tied the score at 61:29 with an assist from fellow midfielder Brad Miller. Then Jacobs, the teams leading scorer, took over.

At 68:02 Matt Edgerly scored the game winner, his first goal of the year, set up by Jacobs. Jacobs then provided an insurance goal (his 10th of the season) with seven minutes remaining in the game.

With the two wins UMass improves to 6-9 overall with four remaining home games. The Minutemen have done well at home and would like to finish with a winning record.

"For some reason the team is more focused and always plays a more consistent game at home," said assistant coach Rob Donnenwirth.

UMass hosts Dartmouth tomorrow afternoon at Garber Field, looking to make it a five game winning streak.

A solution to boring ties

BETWEEN THE PIPES
Mike DiLorenzo on the NHL

Several years ago, the NHL implemented a five-minute overtime period for regular-season games. Its function was to eliminate the great number of tie games that were played. While this has been accomplished to some degree, there are still too many deadlocks for a fan's liking.

Consider that through Saturday's play, eight of 71 NHL games ended in a tie, or roughly 11 percent. The NFL plays maybe three ties over a whole season (224 games), about 1 percent. In fact, this past week, the Boston Bruins played in three consecutive tie games (which brings up that infernal issue of league parity, which we'll save for another day). Clearly, when a fan plunks down his 20-plus dollars to see an NHL game, he wants to see a winner and a loser. Therefore, the high rate of ties during the regular season is unacceptable.

The solution? A longer overtime period? I don't think so. While the unlimited overtime format for playoff games is clearly the way to go, it would not be palpable for regular- season games. Besides, games that produce such epic overtimes as the 1987 Caps-isles quadruple-OT or 1988 Bruins- Oilers triple-OT are special and reserved for the playoffs only. Their suspense and drama could only be formulated in the playoffs and only under the duress of a long OT ses-

Volleyball splits weekend games

By DAVID GLEESON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team had mixed results from their competition this past weekend. They defeated Rutgers to pick up their second A-10 victory, and losing to A-10 powerhouse Temple.

The Minutewomen beat Rutgers in five games, losing the first 15-11, picking up the second 15-10, then losing the third game 15-11. UMass managed a comeback with their backs against the wall though, winning the fourth and fifth games by a score of 15-11 to take the match.

UMass, who have been having a tough time with hitting accuracy of late, managed a well rounded attack with three players having double figure kills, and a .202 hitting percentage. The two games UMass lost can be attributed in a large part to poor hitting, having only a .123 percentage in the loses.

Highlighting the teams performance was Rachel Sky's offensive contribution of 16 kills and only two errors. In addition setter Cass Anderson turned in another excellent performance collecting 46 assists.

The Minutewomen's match against Temple did not fare as well, with UMass winning only one game. UMass lost the first two games 15-11, 15-8, then won 15-13, before losing the last game and the match by a disappointing score of 15-1.

Despite the loss, the match was highlighted by some excellent individual performances. Sky delivered a first class performance again in this match with 15 kilis and 18 digs. Dionne Nash contributed 15 kills and 12 digs, and Susan Maga turned in her third 20 dig performance collecting 23.

The Minutewomen, 9-8 overall, have been considerably successful outside conference play but their A-10 record stands at a dissappointing 2-5, with some big games looming in the near future.

US troops to pull out of Somalia

By ROBERT BURNS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a further step back from armed confrontation with Mohamed Farrah Aidid, President Clinton ordered a pullout Tuesday of Army Ranger forces he had sent to Somalia to capture the clan leader.

The move reflected the administration's effort to shift the focus in Somalia toward pursuing a political settlement followlng the deaths of 10 Americans in the disastrous Ranger raid on Aidid loyalists Oct. 3.

"Right now we are engaging in a political process to see how we can resolve our mission in Somalia," Clinton told reporters at the White House. "So right now we're in a stand down position."

At the Pentagon, spokeswoman Kathleen deLaski said a Ranger task force of about 750 men would be withdrawn from Somalia "in the next couple of days." Officials declined to provide a full breakdown.

Sixteen of the 18 Americans who died in the Oct. 3 raid were members of the Ranger task force.

DeLaski said about 6,300 U.S. troops now remain in Somalia.

Clinton said the time was right to pull out the Rangers because two Marine Expeditionary Units, totaling about 3,600 men with helicopters and armored vehicles, had arrived off the Somali coast aboard Navy ships. Clinton suggested the Marines could substitute for the Rangers if necessary, although deLaski said there were no plans to bring the Marines ashore, barring an emergency.

Clinton's announcement came two days after the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Madeleine Albright, publicly confirmed that U.S. soldiers in Somalia had stopped trying to capture Aidid. DeLaski noted that he remains wanted by the United Nations for his alleged role in a June attack in Mogadishu, the Somali capital, in which 24 Pakistani peacekeepers were killed.

"There is not an active effort to search for members of the Aidid apparatus," deLaski said.

Clinton sent an initial contingent of 400 Army Rangers to Mogadishu on Aug. 24 in response to a series of bloody attacks on Americans for which Aidid or his loyalists were blamed. Although the administration did not say so publicly at the time, the Rangers' mission was to capture the elusive Aidid.

Campusfest draws large crowds

Two-day advertising event gives students free gifts

NATHAN MARTIN/COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts students Jon Guhl and Jim Paquette duke it out at Joust, one of the many activities students participated in at the two-day Campusfest.

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Correspondent

Where can you get hit in the head with a stick and then grab some free Nuprin to cure your headache? This week for two days you could have gotten them both outside the Campus Center at Campusfest, sponsored by the Board of Govenors and the University Store.

Campusfest is a national college campus tour created by a company called Market Source. The tour was designed to advertise products on college campuses using different themes. The theme this year was sports. Such companies as Sports Illustrated, Champion, and Nuprin sponsored the two-day event.

"Companies use Campusfest as an opportunity to introduce their products to students all across the country," said George Fitzgerald, chair of the board of government.

This year's Campusfest involved several sporting activities ranging from a batting cage to a jousting pit typical of the television show "American Gladiators." Students registered for the sports competition and every entry gave students a chance to win prizes.

The events consisted of a basketball and football challenge, a golf driving range, and a batting cage. Two of the more interesting events were the bungee run and the joust.

Many companies used the sports theme to advertise their products. Sports Illustrated and Champion were the main sponsors. Many companies set up booths.

Haagen-Dazs and Tropicana gave free samples of their ice cream and drinks. Students were able to sign up for free minutes on the telephone with MCI or try and win a Toyota truck or car.

Sea Breeze and Nuprin booths offered free samples and Maxell gave away free hats. There was even a booth where a wheel was spun and students had the chance to win instant prizes. For a few minutes of your time and your mailing address companies were willing to give away their products.

UMass students turned out in large numbers for the two days of Campusfest.

"UMass always has a greater turnout than any other university that Campusfest visits," said Fitzgerald. "This year was no exception."

Campusfest gave students a chance to test their athletic skills and gave business a chance to advertise their products.

Henry case is critical in the history of LSC

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

[Editors note-This is the second of a four part series examining the Legal Services Center—its past, present, and potential future.]

Legal Services Center Staff Attorney Thomas Coish said, that from 1975 until 1987, the student Legal Services Office at the University of Massachusetts, like many others at major universities across the United States and Canada, was able to represent student-clients in litigation involving various types of legal issues, as determined by its governing board.

These cases typically involved violations of student's rights as tenants, consumers, employees and citizens. The LSO was considered a national model as one of the most effective and comprehensive such programs in the country.

The University of Maine at Orono was the only other student legal services program in the country authorized to sue its own university. This was specifically authorized by the UMass Board of Trustees in 1975 and 1976.

While most University administrators did not oppose student representation in off-campus disputes, cases involving the University created conflicts between LSO staff and administrators to whom they reported. This all came to a head with the case of Yvette Henry.

In the fall of 1983, there was a series of fires set in many residence halls across campus. As this continued without any success in finding the person responsible, an atmosphere of panic developed which was reported widely in the press and caused concern for students, parents, officials and legislators.

In early December, based upon a questionable and racially-tainted psychological profile of the arsonist produced by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, University and state police and officials took an African-American woman, Yvette Henry, a senior honors student in chemistry and a resident assistant in Crampton Hall, into custody.

With no real evidence against her, she was arrested and questioned for hours while being denied access to an attorney. She was forced to spend that week-

Senate passes bill prohibiting blockades of abortion clinics

By ROBERT TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON—in a vote pro-choice advocates hailed as a first, the Senate approved a bill Tuesday that would outlaw blockades of clinics that perform abortions.

The anti-abortion group Operation Rescue, which stages clinic blockades that often include protesters chaining themselves to doors and vehicles, vowed to test the measure if it becomes law.

"Obviously this is a piece of legislation designed to singie out one particular group, not so much for what they do as why they do it," said Bill Cotter, director of Operation Rescue's Massachusetts chapter.

The Senate approved the bill, which passed the House in May, on a 26-11 vote after backers fought off three amendments from anti-abortion senators aimed at gutting the penalties.

The bill still must undergo another vote in the House and Senate. Gov. William Weld said he would sign the bill.

"I'm satisfied that the bill is not an unfair impingement on peaceful picketing," Weld said.

Joyce Cuhna, head of Mass Choice, and Sen. Lois Pines, one of the bill's chief sponsors, said Tuesday's vote was the first time a piece of a pro-choice legislation had passed the Senate, which despite its domination by Democrats, traditionally has been opposed to abortion.

"We did it. This is a major victory," Cuhna said. "It is very important to deal aggressively with these anti-choice terrorists."

The bill would provide a maximum penalty of six months in jail and a $5,000 fine for subsequent offenses

Pines, D-Newton, said the bill's purpose was two-fold: to protect women seeking treatment at clinics, and to prevent abortion foes from locking themselves to car mufflers and sidewalk railings with kryptonite locks that must be burned off.

She stressed that abortion foes would not be arrested for demonstrating peacefully at clinics.

"This is an issue for every community that happens to have a facility that offers abortion services...the terror has been escalating," Pines said.

A Superior Court order prohibits about 40 activists and certain organizations from continuing to block access to clinics.

Cotter, recently released after serving 19 1/2 months of a 2 1/2 year prison term for violating the court injunction, said Operation Rescue would not pay attention to a law forbidding blockades.

Newman Center continues phone fund-raiser

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

The Newman Center is now wrapping up a 15-day phone-a-thon which has reached out to Catholic alumni and parents of Catholic students, asking them for pledges to help reach the $130,000 goal the Center needs to keep its doors open to University of Massachusetts students.

Over the past two weeks about 500 volunteers have been working the 30 phones available. Judith Smith, Director of Development at the Newman Center, estimated that about 2/3 of those volunteers are from the Greek area.

"We couldn't do it without the Greeks," Smith said.

In its eighth year, the phone-a-thon has become a big fall event for the Greeks, especially in the last five years, said Smith.

According to Interfraternity Council President Steve Ziolkowski, almost every house participates in the phone-a-thon every year as "appreciation and thanks" to the Center. He said the houses do this service willingly because the Newman Center and the Greek area do go hand-in-hand.

As of Monday night, the volunteers have raised over $121,000 in pledges, including the $58,837 by the Greek area. This volunteering has a twist to it: while Greeks are calling for pledges, they are also working on helping their house win prizes for the most money raised during the 15-day venture.

As of yesterday, Sigma Phi Epsilon was in the lead for the fraternities, raising $14,510 in pledges, and Alpha Epsilon Phi had raised $9,212 to lead the sororities.

The Newman Center is not a UMass facility, but rather a "good work" of the Catholic diocese of Springfield. Unlike other Newman Centers, which are only open to catholic students, the UMass one is a very open model to the whole community, said Father Lavelle, director of the Center.

Known for as a place to worhip, to study, hang out or eat, the Newman Center is considered a focal point for students living in the Central and Greek areas on campus.

Lavelle said the Newman Center plays an important role in campus life, pointing out the fact the English Department and School of Business both use the facility on a regular basis.

Syria-Isreal relations set precedent for negotiations

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

The 1991 convention in Madrid has had "remarkable results" for Israel and its relations with other Middle East countries such as Syria, said a former Washington Middle Eastern Affairs advisor Monday night.

Approximately 35 people met at the Campus Center to listen to Jonathan Kessler, former executive director of the Center for the Middle East Peace and Economic Cooperation in Washington.

Bilateral negotiations between Syria and Israel have been instrumental in setting a precedent for negotiations between Israel and Arab countries, Kessler said.

Both countries have been working in what Kessler calls "multilateral negotiations" for the past two years.

Kessler said five working groups have been meeting on a daily basis to discuss issues on the management of water resources, environment, war, refugee control and economic cooperation.

Even the president of Iraq, Saddam Hussein, was quoted on Iraqi television endorsing the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, Kessler said, although Iraq, along with Libya and Sudan, is one of the three Arab countries which are not participating in neither bilateral or multicultural negotiations.

"Bilateral talks between Israel and Syria have reached a proof of understanding," Kessler said.

But, according to Kessler, there were three components needed for both countries to reach a final agreement: peace, in the case of Israel; territory disputes, in the case of Syria.

The third component agreed by both countries was security guarantees. Syria recognized the legitimate concerns for security from Israel, while Israel recognized Syria's, according to Kessler.

"Once Israel and Syria reach an agreement on these three aspects to end their conflict, then they are haggling over the price," Kessler said, of more land or less peace between both countries.

"Neither side has figured out how to to break through," Kessler said.

"Israel asks Syria to define peace, Syria asks Israel to define withdrawal [in land territory]," Kessler said.

"Is it open boundaries, diplomacy, change in policy, change in the dynamics of the relationship?" Kessler questioned.

The lecture was sponsored by the UMass Hillel House, the American Zionist Movement and the University Student Department of American Zionist Foundation.

Religion differs in cultural histories

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

For natives of Central America and Mexico, an image of Christ with bloody knees "from crawling in the permanents as a sacrifice," is related to their historical background, said an art history expert yesterday.

Sam Edgerton, professor of art history at Williams College, gave the lecture "Art and Anticipation: How the Indians and Spaniards saw each other in 1520" at Amherst College.

"In Mexico, the image of a bloody Christ was great," Edgerton said.

"Indians got impressed with the concept of Christ being sacrificed and his blood being redeemed for the whole humanity," Edgerton said.

In Native American religion, there is no notion of redemption, said Edgerton. "[T]here's no institutionalized mercy within the Native American Gods."

According to Edgerton, Spaniards saw themselves "confronting their past in another culture" when they got in contact with the Aztecs.

In the Renaissance mentality, the Aztecs were the "old world" for the Spaniards, versus the "new world" of ideas in Europe.

Edgerton said that the Natives were compared by the Spaniards to the Greeks and the Romans.

"Since the Romans were pagans, they [the Natives] had to be converted," said Edgerton, referring to the 16th century Spaniard Christian mentality. For the Natives, Spaniards were first seen as gods, according to Edgerton, but their point of view changed, after they were abused.

There was no malice involved at the beginning of the colonization process, said Edgerton. "It came after they [Spaniards] saw resistance [from the Natives]."

NY firm to check out Mullins

The University has hired an engineering firm from New York City to look into the safety of the William D. Mullins Center design.

An engineer working for the state attorney general concluded that the 9,500-seat Mullins Center could not withstand high winds or a moderate earthquake. The report was issued Oct. 9.

Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page announced Monday that Thornton-Tomasetti Engineers Inc. has begun work on a second report that is expected to be released by Thursday night, when the next event is scheduled for the arena.

The University said it would shut down Mullins Center when winds reach 55 miles an hour. The $50 million arena opened in February amid concerns over the quality of the construction.

Thornton-Tomasetti investigated the collapse of the Hartford (Conn.) Civic Center in 1970 and the 1987 collapse of the L'Ambiance Plaza in Bridgeport, Conn.

According to the Associated Press, Page said the University will pay the engineering firm from $6,000 to $50,000, depending on their findings.

Another engineering firm, Simpson, Gumpertz and Heger, has also been re-examining the center. The Boston firm previously determined that the building did not pose an immediate danger to public safety, the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported.

Being disabled doesn't mean you are not a part of society

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

The Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA) has reinvented the definition of what being disabled means, said Professor of Communication Disorders E. Harris Nober yesterday in the Memorial Hall lounge.

"The act is the most significant of its kind of this decade," Nober said in an hour-long conference where he delved into what the impact of societal forces has on the disabled in 20th-century America.

"It separates disabilities into three components—a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities of such an individual, having a record of such an impairment, or being regarded as having such an impairment."

He also noted that, in keeping with the rest of the political-correctness that is going on, that "crippie", used as a word to identify the impaired has been frowned upon.

"'Cripple' has gone to 'handicap' to 'disabled' and now it's apparently 'physically-challenged'," Nober said. "Also, a deaf person is 'auditorially-impaired' and the blind are 'visually-impaired.' Terms will change continually, but many are unhappy with anything that alludes to an abnormality."

end in jail, and she was fired from her job, expelled from the University and banned from the campus, without any hearing or opportunity to contest the accusations against her.

Then-Chancellor Joseph Duffy and others made public statements of her guilt to the local, state and national media, even though there was no real evidence of her guilt.

Three weeks after her arrest, all charges against her were dropped for lack of evidence. By then, however, her academic career at UMass and her reputation, as well as her legal and civil rights, had been damaged and violated.

In 1984, the LSO, with two private attorneys, brought suit in federal court against UMass and its officials, as well as state police and the FBI, for numerous violations of Henry's legal and civil rights stemming from her arrest, interrogation, confinement and expulsion from the University. The lawsuit created even more of a stir in the media, and the whole affair was a major disaster for the University and its reputation, as well as the top officials who were responsible for the decisions and actions involved.

In the spring of 1986, the lawsuit was settled on terms that were not made public; UMass officials never admitted any guilt of liability for their actions, and never apologized in any way for what they did to Henry. What they did do, however, even before the settlement, is take immediate steps to remove LSO's authority to represent students against the University.

Bringing on the night also means bringing out the Mace

My sleeves are pushed up, my arms are free and my hands in position. Do you know what this ritual means to me? I'm walking alone at night.

It's night, dark, and no one is in sight. I stand on a curb looking at the far end of the street — where I would much rather be. The simplest question is posed: How do you get from point A to point B? In a straight line? You better believe it. I'll run in a straight line as fast as I can to my front door.

As I make my way down the street, I am aware there are no street lights on. I turn in every direction as I hear the sounds of night around me. I walk in the middle of the street because the sidewalks are next to woods. I am very aware that I am a woman, alone and walking down a dark street.

Sometimes I hold my keys or a pen in my hand, but what good would that do if I am attacked? I recall self-defense techniques and the karate I memorized, but will I properly react if I were attacked?

I do think the night is beautiful, it's what can happen to a woman in the night that I think is ugly.

I have met men on this campus who can't understand why their female friends don't want to walk alone to the library at night. They think a woman is stupid for waiting over a half an hour for the escort service to bring her back to her dorm. They can't understand why women carry mace, why they take self-defense classes, why they always let someone know where they are going at night.

Stacy
MALONE

I am not saying these men are stupid; I am saying these women are smart. They are smart for being aware as women in a society that is violent against women.

Women constantly face the threat of violence and violation against them that men cannot identify with. The awareness of women, their actions and reactions, have become part of their lifestyle. A lifestyle that men do not have to identify with, because the violence is not directed toward them.

A professor of one of my classes said that if a woman walked down a dark street and saw four men approaching her, she would be scared to death. If a man walked down a dark street and saw four women approaching him, he would think it was his lucky night. I am aware that as a woman I am much more susceptible to being raped, sexually assaulted and attacked than any man walking down the same street as I.

It took a while for me to realize that I was not feeling paranoia, rather a concern for my safety. Although I am a person, I am always aware that I am a woman. I take precautions when I am out alone at night, when I am alone with a man I don't know well, when I am with a male professor...

My safety is important to me. I face dangers everyday just because I am a woman. I believe awareness is the first step in a woman protecting herself.

Violence against women is a serious problem in every town, state and country. Unfortunately, the laws and police can't protect us everywhere we go.

Women must learn to be aware and protect themselves, because no one else is going to do it for them.

Stacy Malone is a Collegian columnist.

A question of 'Clumps'

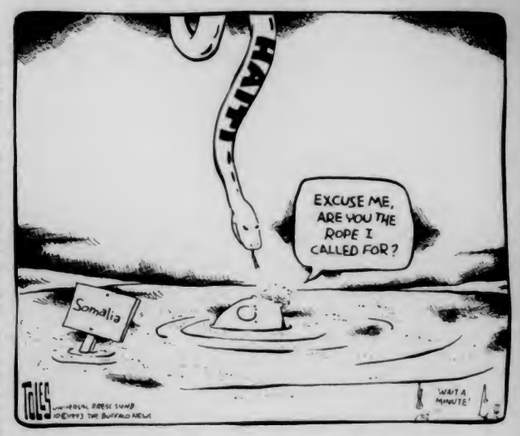
Today, let's talk about hair-clumps in your shower drain. We all have them, and even though we've been trained by less-enlightened older generations not to talk about them, they're nothing to be ashamed about bringing into the open. Let's explore.

I wonder if Bill Clinton bends down in the Oval Shower to pick out the First Hair-Clumps, or is there someone on the White House staff who does it? Bill claims to be a man of the people, but does he deign to touch the Clump Rodham Clintons that stop up his shower? Or is he too big for that? Does he think that because he's the President of the United States and the most powerful leader on the planet that he's too important to deal with his own shower-drain clogs?

Mark Tyler
WENHAM

Is he going to appoint someone to deal with the national shower-clogging agenda? Does Hillary consider this issue to be a part of her health-care reform package? Don't belittle this thought, folks; if Bill and Hill can't deal with their own damn shower drain and the sticky, suspicious wads of hairy goo that get stuck in it, how are they going to fix this great country of ours?

I'm quite sure that Hillary at least looks at the clumps when she's naked in the shower (now there's an image). It has to bother her to some extent, being that she's so concerned about health. And let's face it: health begins with what touches your feet in the shower. But the question remains: does she bend over, pick up the hairy little beastie in the drain and move it to the First Toilet herself, or does she simply let the shower water back up and then dance and splash around in it, singing "Achy-Breaky Heart," before getting out and telling an aide to unclog Drain One?



Or has the military developed some kind of Top Secret shower-drain with an Anti-Clog Mechanism that only Big Honchos in Washington have? You don't really know where your hard-earned American tax dollars are going, do you?

And speaking of an important social issue, I think that it would be a very good idea if all of the families in America were to get together tonight for a nuclear dinner (as in family unit, not as in glowing, mutating platters of dead farm animals), and have an open, honest discussion about the word "clump." This is a wonderful word, isn't it? Say it to yourself a few times with meaning: "CLUMP." Let it roil around in your mouth a little. Isn't a sensual word that brings to mind really delicious images?

Today, let's all incorporate the word "clump" into our conversations at least ten times. Imagine the warmth and wonder you'll bring into the lives of friends and families (and complete strangers, too!) when you say things like: "That's a lovely CLUMP of broccoli between your teeth." Or: "You should really pop that huge white CLUMP growing all over your forehead." Or: "Honey, come on over here and sit on my CLUMP for a while."

Don't you feel warmer already? And can you imagine the healing that would take place in this country if Bill were to get on national TV with his wife and say, "Hillary, my CLUMP belongs to you." And Hillary, tears in her eyes, would say back, "Bill my darling, our CLUMPS are one. There is no CLUMP separateness with us. Together, we can turn America into one big, happy, healthy, prosperous, racially-integrated CLUMP." Yes, they are Baby Boomers, but still...wouldn't you shed a joyous tear?

AIDS isn't a homosexual disease

This is in response to Michael Morrissey's article on spending money for AIDS research [Collegian, Oct. 15] and how he thinks this disease only occurs among homosexuals, "druggies," and other people who live risky lives, which, according to Mr. Morrissey, encompasses only homosexuals and druggies.

What I want to know is how Mr. Morrissey gets off thinking that everything started with homosexuals and so forth. AIDS is everyone's disease, unfortunately. Even straight or clean people get it. But of course he is too conservative and close-minded to admit to that.

He stated that, "AIDS is blown out of proportion. More money is wasted on AIDS then on almost any other disease and a Democratic president may incorporate AIDS into a national health plan, costing businesses and taxpayers millions." Where has he been for the past decade or more, living in the Stone Age?

All I have to say is that this writer had better open his eyes a little more. AIDS is not just a homosexual and "druggie" disease. The money which is spent each day may bring a cure or a vaccine to reality a day closer.

Why we should change the mascot

It is interesting how the reporting of the Minuteman logo issue is mostly one-sided and biased from the viewpoint of those who think the idea is a silly waste of student activism. Where is the other half of the story? Why does this logo bother students enough for them to try and change it? I haven't heard their side but I thought about why I don't think it's a stupid cause.

Fair enough, the Minuteman symbolizes freedom, but it also represents a time when not everyone was free. The Minuteman is also a symbol of when white men were out fighting while the women stayed home, and slavery still existed in this country. There is no glorification of the freesom that slaves "won." Instead of instantly scoffing at the efforts of those you see as knee-jerk reactionaries, maybe their course isn't just a political correctness rampage, but something you haven't heard from all angles or without bias.

Policy merits serious discussion

As a new student on campus, i am very happy to see the issue regarding U.S. immigration policy addressed seriously [Collegian, Oct. 15]. As a Cuban-American, I could not understand why several of my family members were warmly welcomed to the United States in 1992, receiving preferential treatment, and why this treatment was not extended to others, especially Haitians.

I agree with Ms. De Jesus that there is something inherently flawed in a policy that accords rights to some groups and not others. This lack of uniformity inevitably led to confusion amongst the Mexican authorities who did not understand the nature of "preferential treatment." They incorrectly assumed that if the Chinese and other groups were to be deported, that Cubans were to be deported as well.

To explain this clearly contradictory policy on racist grounds would be too simple. For one thing, the Haitian community in the United States does not yet have the economic and political influences that the Cuban community does.

The national Cuban American Foundation, headed by Jorge Mascanosa, influences policy making in Congress through vigorous lobbying efforts. The exiled community also has representation in Congress that other groups lack. Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen and Jose DiazBalart strongly advocate favorable immigration policies that benefit Cubans.

Until they change their narrow-minded tendencies, or until other minority groups gain sufficient voice in our government, these grossly discriminatory policies will continue.

Coppola's Dracula takes a bite out of HSCN

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

Don't worry, this column has absolutely nothing to do with the Minuteman controversy. I think everybody should chill out and watch a few movies. This week's batch is really quite good, so do yourself a favor and enjoy a few. The three movies I strongly recommend from the list are Taxi Driver, The Commitments, and Bram Stoker's Dracula. The Crying Game almost beat Dracula, but I dig anything gothic.

HSCN Reviews

Taxi Driver — This is a truly incredible movie, but it is not for everyone. It portrays life in such a hopeless dreary, yet realistic way that I think you need to have lived in a city for a while to begin to relate to it. For instance, the protagonist, Travis Bickle (Robert DeNiro), a veteran who drives a cab, is so sexually alienated from society that for a second date, he takes the lady (Cybal Shepherd) to a hard core movie. This disturbing noir-ish tale is both violent and frightening with an ending that is sure to shock. Martin Scorcese directs this hell of a picture. A+

Rambo First Blood Part II — Cheeze. 'Nuff Said. F

Trading Places — Eddie Murphy and Dan Aykroyd star in this enjoyable comedy about what would happen if a rich white snob traded places with a poor black hustler. This is one of the movies that made Murphy the star (possibly fading now?) that he is today, and rightfully so, it's a very witty performance.

Winona Ryder and Gary Oldman vamp it up in "Bram Stoker's Dracula."

Add Jamie Lee Curtis and an entertaining revenge ending, and you've got a movie to relax too. A-

White Men Can't Jump — Woody Harrelson, Wesley Snipes and Rosie Perez star in this street basketball movie. It is funny, the performances are solid, and the plot is there most of the time so you can't help but like it. Harrelson and Snipes are basketball hustlers who go for big money, but run into problems along the way, mainly each other. White Men Can't Jump is overshadowed by the better movies this week. Worth seeing though, if you have the time. B

Against All Odds — This is a sizzling story of love and betrayal. Nothing new or deep, but strong performances by Jeff Bridges, Rachel Ward and James Woods make potential soap opera into serious drama. Bridges plays a football player sidelined for a season forced to go after Rachel Ward and bring her back. Woods does a good job as the slimy gambler. I know this quick review doesn't make the movie sound that appealing, but it is. A-

The Commitments — This movie is a lot of fun. The story of a Dublin soul band's rise and eventual demise is funny, interesting and contains some really cool tunes. One warning though, they use "F" word a lot, so those easily offended (you know who you are) look elsewhere for entertainment. The best scenes are when the manager of the band's father talks about and impersonates Elvis, classic stuff. This is the study break movie of the week. A-

The Crying Game - I wonder if everyone knows the surprise of this movie. I'm not sayin' if you don't. The first half an hour of the movie is mostly a fascinating conversation about life between a hostage and one of the terrorists who captured him. It's very likely he is going to die the next morning, and these are his final words. It's the little things that make movies great, and this one has a beauty of a short story about a frog and a scorpion. But I digress, the movie then moves to London for a complex love story that is absolutely captivating. The critics were right, this is good stuff. A-

Bram Stoker's Dracula - Despite Winona Ryder and Keanu Reeves, I still really enjoyed this picture. This is mainly due to an exceptional performance by Gary Oldman. Oldman, currently the second most diverse actor, right behind Dustin Hoffman, has a field day with his role as Dracula - he steals every scene he's in. Everybody knows the basic story, but this one plays up the romantic aspects of it. Singer Tom Waits is very good as a mental patient who eats flies for dinner.

Director Francis Ford Coppola uses a dark gothic style that is visually quite beautiful. This movies proves once again that it's cool to be a vampire. A-

Friday the 13th - For crap, this is still awful. At least when you see it in theaters, the audience is a comedy routine in itself. Why anyone would watch this alone or seriously is beyond me. I don't think I'll even go into the plot, we've seen the commercials for the eight sequals to remind us. If you want a movie that spoof's garbage like this, check out Evil Dead II. F

Less Than Zero - This one never was given the critical attention it deserved when it came out. Andrew McCarthy plays Clay, a clean-cut college kid who comes back to Beverly Hills to find that his girlfriend and best friend are drug addicts. The movie shows the glamorous wild parties and how they lead to self destruction. James Spader (sex, lies and videotape) does an outstanding job as an amoral slick drug dealer who wants the money Clay's friend owes him. Check it out. A-

MATTHEW J. SIMONEAU / COLLEGIAN
Professor E. Harris Nober

Some entitlements for the disabled surfaced by the ADA are prohibition of employment discrimination, public or private services, installation of telecommunication equipment for those with speech or hearing disorders, and that no other law can 'be construed to invalidate, negate, or reduce the scope of this Act, that the federal government has a central role to enforce these Titles using congressional authority based on the 14th amendment of the U.S. Constitution.'

Much of Nober's discussion centered on those with hearing disabilities, separating the levels of hearing into three components, those being primitive, protective, and aesthetic.

"Primitive is where a person who could hear, for example, is put in a sound-proof room. They'd feel a dullness and would therefore be aware of the stimuli," Nober said. "Protective hearing never shuts off; it's where you might talk in your sleep or a mother notices different crying tones of her baby. Asthetic is where the hearing relates to speech, and that's where the most concern is, helping the deaf with language."

Nober said that considerations for the handicapped goes back many years, as the Egyptians gave legal and religious rights to the deaf and blind, adding that most early research really dealt strictly with those two groups.

"By 1867, every U.S. deaf school used American Sign Language," Nober said. "By 1907, every school was an oral school, much of that work being contributed by Alexander Graham Bell. President Roosevelt in the '30s also was concerned for the disabled, and during the '40s war years, there was a lot of speculation done for veterans who were expected to return with hearing problems."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Mixed signals may be holding you back. Try to get to the bottom of things before a tricky situation gets completely out of hand. Good luck helps you rejuvenate a valuable relationship.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A dilemma is solved to your satisfaction. What a relief not to have to depend on others! You can be very self-sufficient when the chips are down.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Try not to let feelings of loneliness creep into your life. Get out and circulate more. Children take careful not of what you do and do not do.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): New adventures await you. Plan ahead and there will be no stopping you! Make your move quickly. Your spirit is meant to soar. Let go of silly doubts and try something totally different.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Adjust to changing circumstances without complaint. Flattery will get you everywhere! Just make certain you are being honest with yourself about your true feelings.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Friends and money are not a good combination today. Stay clear of get-rich-quick schemes. Dig deeper within yourself if looking for a way to turn your life around.

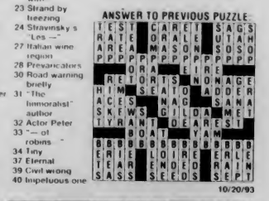
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your optimistic outlook is a great asset today. Take a change in plans or procedures in stride. Influential people are impressed by your flexibility and willingness to try new things.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A show of impatience on your part will only slow things down in the long run. Pay strict attention to duty and detail. Good work habits will produce first-rate financial results!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Make sure your financial affairs are in good order. This is a time when being well-organized will really pay off for you. Wrap up a work assignment quickly to meet a deadline.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Disregard rumors that do not involve you. You should have more important things on your mind. An internal ing conversation could lead to bigger and better accomplishments.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A goal you have set may be difficult to achieve. An occasional setback or delay should not cause you to lose heart. Success comes to those who persist! Dine at home tonight.



PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Confusing emotions could surface now. Your sensitivity to a loved one's needs will be richly rewarded. Keep your diary under lock and key.

"How Well Do You Handle Risk?"

We manage risk rather than just execute transactions. Our dynamic staff, heavy on technical expertise, continually pioneers new ways to creatively engineer and manage large portfolios of derivative instruments. The courage to take risk, fly in the face of tradition and strong analytical orientation are essential to succeed in our meritocratic environment. As a dominant force in the markets, our "traders are feared and respected on options exchanges." (WSJ 12/12/91)

O'Connor & Associates is the premier mathematically-oriented derivatives trading firm. As a key component of the O'Connor Partnerships*, we have defined state-of-the-art trading and risk management of North American equity related instruments. missed four field goals while losing 28-21. The Buckeyes have been extended by lesser opponents the last two weeks, hardly what you expect from the No. 3 team in the nation. Penn State makes a visit to Columbus on the 30th of October and it's back to reality for OSU.

Yes, sir, the only team that can beat Florida St. is Alabama. Hopefully, we can see that match-up in January.

Four great games highlighted last weekend. First of all, Michigan ran past Penn State 21-13 behind 192 rushing yards from Tyrone Wheatley. The Wolverine defense decided to show up, unfortunately a few weeks late. The Nittany Lions have officially been welcomed to the Big Ten, now watch them roar.

The Auburn Tigers pulled a shocker by upending Florida 38-35. As I've said before, the Gator defense is subpar, obviously not good enough to contend for the title. Alabama was able remain in title contention when QB Jay Barker scored with 21 seconds remaining. Great move by Gene Stallings putting speedy wideout David Palmer under center for the two point conversion. Palmer simply outran everyone to the right corner for the tie.

No. 7 Arizona continued its march through the Pac 10 by staging a remarkable comeback win over Stanford. The "Cactus Curtain" defense is one of the best in the land; the Wildcats will make their first ever Rose Bowl appearance this year. They continue to be snubbed by the media, but their schedule is dictated by the Pac 10 and the 'Cats are 6-0.

Looking ahead to this weekend there is only one contest with national interests. Those crybabies from Syracuse travel down to Miami. Miami Coach Dennis Erickson has switched quarterbacks to scrambler Ryan Collins, giving the Hurricanes a look they've never had. An angry Miami team rolls over the Orange 27-16.

I predict a big upset this weekend. Texas A&M travels to Rice on Saturday. The Owls are much improved and the Aggies will overlook Rice, a big mistake: Rice will pull the upset 19-17.

Wheatley's performance has thrown him back into Heisman contention. But it is now Ward's trophy to lose, he has to come up big in South Bend on November 13. Great SEC quarterbacks like Heath Shuler and Eric Zeier also have strong passing numbers, but their programs hold them back. So, watch out for Rice and Miami this weekend and root hard for the USC Trojans.

caught fire lately, though, getting a goal in each of UMass' three victories last week in the midst of a four-game win streak.

"I don't know if it's too late to make this a great season," Jacobs said. "But every game I give 110 percent, and when I walk off the field, I've performed to the best of my abilities."

Jacobs will be gunning for the record books today (3 p.m., Richard F. Garber Field) against Dartmouth, the No. 2 team in New England.

victory) Dartmouth didn't really have a sustained attack but they got the big win anyway."

Offensively, Dartmouth relies on freshman Melissa McBean, six goals, three assists, and junior Brittany Boulanger, who has scored four goals and two assists.

"This is not an easy game," Rudy said. "They deserve to be in the top 20 and a win today can put them in good position for the NCAAs."

Randy Jacobs takes aim at record book

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Senior Randy Jacobs, the leading scorer on the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team, was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

There have been many players who have mastered the art of scoring goals in the sport of soccer here at the University of Massachusetts, but Randy Jacobs is the best of the best.

Jacobs, a senior on the Minuteman soccer team, is three goals away from passing all-time leader Tom Coburn (37) and etching his name in the UMass record books as the most prolific goal scorer in school history.

"That is what I was brought here to do: score goals. I go out there every game and hope to score," said Jacobs.

Last season, the forward burst onto the scene after scoring eight goals over his first two seasons in Amherst. Jacobs tallied 17 in 1992, the most ever by a Minuteman in one season.

So heading into the 1993 campaign, Jacobs and the rest of his teammates exuded confidence, especially after their performance in the 1992 Atlantic 10 Tournament, where they fell one penalty kick short of UMass' first trip ever to the NCAA Tournament.

But it has not been as easy as expected. The Minutemen stumbled early and often, losing nine contests through the first 15, thus lessening their chances at a return trip to the A-10 Tournament.

The bright spot, however, is Jacobs' quest for the record books.

"The fact that he has a chance to break the record shows the team's true success, despite being 6-9," UMass Coach Sam Koch said. "It would be fitting if Randy puts the finishing touches on our success."

"That would be a great honor when it happens; it's not only my reward, it's the team's reward. Soccer isn't a one man sport," said Jacobs.

Pressure has been something that has followed Jacobs every game this year because of the lack of offensive support from his teammates. He has 10 of the team's 21 goals, and of the other goal scorers, none has more than three.

Jacobs, according to Assistant Coach Rob Donnenwirth, means to the Minuteman offense what Captain Todd Kylish is to the defense: someone that can be counted on in crunch time.

"Randy is definitely a leader because he's a money-man," Donnenwirth said. "The guys have confidence in him; if he misses an easy one, you can count on him to put the next one in."

By his own admission, Jacobs started off slowly this season after tallying the game-winner in the season opener against Boston University. He has Alabama needed a last second touchdown to tie Tennessee, knocking the Tide down in the rankings to fourth. Florida was upset by Auburn, and dropped all the way down to ninth. Now Notre Dame and Ohio State are the next top-ranked contenders. Both teams appear to be a bit overrated.

Notre Dame opponents have been less than impressive, putting up only a 17-17 combined record. Florida State's opponents have gone 26-12, Miami's 22-4 and even Nebraska's foes have gone 19-12. Beating up on teams like Purdue, Pittsburgh and Navy does not a national champion make.

Ohio State had no business beating Michigan State on Saturday. The Spartans drove into OSU territory all 12 times they had the ball and

Tennis romps in season finale

By DAVE COPELAND
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team closed its regular season yesterday with a convincing 8-1 win over Mt. Holyoke. The Minutewomen finished the season at 5-5 with the victory at Boyden Courts.

"This match, on the whole, was easy for everyone," junior Mary Edwards said. "Everyone played well today."

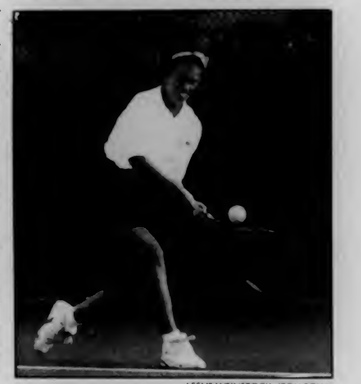
Liesl Sitton was again victorious in singles play, blanking Stacey Derderian 6-0, 6-0. Coach Judy Dixon sat Sitton out for the doubles play, hoping to get her some much needed rest for this weekend's New England Championship at the University of Vermont.

"She's been working really hard for us this season," Dixon said. "I want to save her legs because she has a lot of tennis to play this weekend."

Sitton's usual doubles partner Liz Durant teamed up with Lesley Watts to defeat Derderian and Natalie Meyer in a split-set tie breaker. Durant and Watts also posted winning singles efforts.

Rounding out the team's singles winners, Stacey Scheckner defeated Lauren Mackey 6-1, 6-1, and Ana DeCheke defeated Jessica Durette 6-1, 6-1. Scheckner and DeCheke combined in doubles play to defeat Mackey and Brin Steven 6-2, 6-3.

In the number three doubles, Kathy Schmidt stepped in for Pam Levine, who sat the afternoon out due to illness. Schmidt teamed with Mary Edwards to defeat Laura Welles and Jessica Durette 6-2, 6-2.



Coach Dixon said she was pleased after her team's win.

"They really pulled it together during the last part of the season," she said. "A day like today has me looking forward to the New Englands."

At the New Englands this weekend, Dixon said she is expecting Sitton to be seeded number two, and has high expectations of her performance.

"I really think she can win it all this weekend," Dixon said.

Dixon said she has high hopes for the doubles team of Sitton and Durant, as she does for the rest of her team.

Reds try to wrap up NCAA bid

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The action for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team heats up this week, as it faces critical tests in the form of No. 18 Dartmouth (tomorrow in Hanover, N.H.) and No. 5 Connecticut (Saturday at home).

The Minutewomen (11-2-2), ranked No. 8 nationally, with two victories this week can seal up an NCAA Tournament bid and lay claim to hosting the NCAA Regionals, to be held Nov. 13-14.

The 16-team Tournament will be broken into four regional tournaments and, presumably, each regional will be hosted by the region's top team. What school, most likely either UConn or UMass, will host the first two rounds, will be decided this week.

"Hosting would be a big help," UMass Coach Jim Rudy. "We tend to play better in front of our crowd, on our field."

UMass' only two defeats of the year (to No. 3 Santa Clara and No. 9 William & Mary) came on the road.

With that in mind, the Minutewomen travel to New Hampshire this afternoon with a very important game before them. And in the way is a good Dartmouth team.

The Big Green (9-1) have lost only to Connecicut, 2-1 in overtime, and Steve Swenson's teams always play a difficult to crack, zone defense.

"Their defense has given us trouble before," Rudy said. "And it doesn't appear much different this season."

The Dartmouth defense, anchored by juniors Maggie Essman and Molly Stryker and goal keeper Michelle Conway, has allowed only six goals on the season and shutout its last three opponents.

"They rely on the defense and then come out and strike offensively on a counter attack or a restart," Rudy said. "Against Boston College (a 3-0 Dartmouth

U.N. plan pushes for change in Haiti

By DAVID BEARD
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — Under U.S. pressure to make new concessions, Haiti's prime minister threatened on Wednesday to resign if Haiti's military chiefs don't step down as required by a U.N. plan to restore democracy.

Prime Minister Robert Malval's position further complicated international efforts to push through the plan that envisions the Oct. 30 return of exiled President Jean Bertrand Aristide.

The head of a parliamentary "crisis committee" said lawmakers cannot complete their work in time for Aristide's scheduled return.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Stanley Schrager, however, insisted that the plan was "still not dead."

U.S. and U.N. mediators presented Malval with a document this week that calls for broadening the interim government he heads so that it would include more of Aristide's opponents.

The intent of the document was angrily debated with the Clinton administration by Aristide's supporters, who feel the proposal caves in to the demands of the military leaders.

Six U.S. Navy warships, three Canadian vessels and 10 U.S. Coast Guard cutters are patrolling off Haiti's coast to enforce a worldwide oil and arms embargo that began Monday to force the army to cooperate. Argentina, the Netherlands, Britain, and France are also sending warships.

The U.S. Navy has reported stopping three Haiti-bound ships since the embargo took effect.

The U.N. plan calls for the country's military authorities to step down before Aristide returns. Aristide was ousted in a September military coup.

"If on Oct. 30 President Aristide is not in Haiti... This is the end of my mission," Malval told the Associated Press on Wednesday.

Malval said he did not want to be part of any stalling efforts on the part of Aristide's opponents. An aide said Malval would only consider staying on if Aristide himself extended the Oct. 30 deadline.

Schrager, the U.S. Embassy spokesman, said army commander Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras and police chief Lt. Col. Joseph Michel Francois have demand that Malval include four coup supporters in his Cabinet.

In Washington, Aristide refused to discuss the document, but said, "We are ready to expand the process but first they have to be removed." Aristide was referring to Cedras, Francois and other military leaders.

An Aristide aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the document was a "fancy way for the United Nations and the United States to kowtow to these armed thugs and give them what they are seeking."

About 200 graduate and undergraduate students and community members gathered at the Student Union Ballroom to enjoy African history, culture and music Wednesday evening at the Association of African Heritage Graduate Students' first community event.

"A Celebration of Our Culture", featured gospel music from UMass sophomore Natasha Springer and the Western Massachsetts District Choir from Springfield, and dance from the Bamidele Dancers and Drum Ensemble, from Amherst. The keynote address was given by Onawumi Jean Moss, Associate Dean of Students at Amherst College.

Channel One widening the gap?

UMass professor finds programming detrimental

By VANESSA ADELMAN

The news and advertising program, Channel One, is being broadcast in more poor schools than wealthy ones, according to a University of Massachusetts professor.

Professor Michael Morgan, of the Communications Department, conducted a study which is the latest attack on the 4-year-old program. The study was sponsored by the reform group UNPLUG.

According to Morgan, only 17 percent of the nation's richest schools are using Channel One, but that 38 percent of the poorest have embraced the programming.

"Clearly the schools with the fewest resources are the ones where the students are being exposed to Channel One," Morgan said. "This suggests that the Channel One program and its commercials take the place of more proven educational resources in the country's most impoverished schools."

These schools spend the least amount of money per student on regular texts or other instructional materials, said Morgan.

Whittle Communications donates Channel One to about 12,000 public and private schools. According to Whittle executives, their programming carries 10 minutes of news for every two of advertising and also supplies the schools with televisions, VCRs, and a satellite dish. Channel One broadcasts to approximately eight million 13 to 18-year-olds.

"If there's a large number of schools that have something they didn't have before, then they'd have to be narrowing the gap," Jim Ritts told the Associated Press. Ritts is vice president of network affairs at Channel One.

In his study, Morgan said that schools that spend at least $6,000 per year on students are six times less likely to offer Channel One than schools spending $2,000.

When it came to race, there was a general tendency,

LSO fought for students' rights

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Editor's note — This is the third of a four part series examining the Legal Services Center — its past, present, and potential future.

Legal Services Center staff Attorney Thomas Coish said the University of Massachusetts has had a history of real and perceived insensitivity to issues of civil rights and affirmative action.

Examples go back to the beginning of The New Africa House in the early 1970s, when students of color found it necessary to occupy the building in order to have a facility for their purposes.

Another is the racial brawl that occurred in Southwest in the aftermath of the 1986 World Series, after which investigations by an outside consultant and the Faculty Senate were highly critical of the administration's policies and practice regarding such conflicts, especially its denial of their racial nature. The incidents that occurred last fall in Washington Tower are more recent examples of these problems.

In 1984, Yvette Henry, an African-American woman who was falsely accused of arson and expelled from UMass without a legal due process, filed suit against the University and other state and federal officials with the help of the Legal Services Office. Shortly after the suit was filed, UMass officials approached the director of LSO and told him to prepare plans to give up the power to litigate against UMass.

He responded by explaining that doing so without the permission of student-clients would be highly improper and unethical. LSO began having difficulty in getting cooperation on a range of administrative and personnel issues.

An outside consultant who was legal counsel to a Midwestern university was then hired by the administration to do a review of LSOs mission and purpose. This consultant concluded generally that there was nothing inherently wrong with the LSOs structure and policies, including the right to sue the University. His report and its conclusions were ignored.

In August of 1986, shortly after the Yvette Henry case was settled, the Trustees met to vote on a proposal of the administration to remove LSOs authority to represent students in disputes with the University.

Report for today's standards

By DAVID BRIGGS
Associated Press

Masturbation is healthy, the Bible supports homosexual unions, and teaching teens how to use condoms to prevent diseases is a moral imperative, says a task force leading the nation's largest Lutheran body into the sex wars.

Four years in the making, a draft statement going before the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America declares that the core of human sexuality should be loving, committed relationships.

"It is the binding commitment, not the license or ceremony, that lies at the heart of biblical understandings of marriage," says the statement. "In those circumstances where a legal marriage is not feasible, communities of faith may need to consider other ways of publicly affirming and communally supporting a loving, binding commitment between two people."

The 21-page report — "The Church and Human Sexuality: A Lutheran Perspective," — a copy of which was released to the Associated Press — is to be sent later this week to 19,000 pastors and other church leaders in the 5.2 million member denomination.

Foreshadowing current U.S. ferment over gay rights, mainline Protestant denominations have been convulsed in recent years over demands by gay and lesbian members that churches accord them formal acceptance and the right of ordination.

LSO litigation battle continues as SGA fights

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

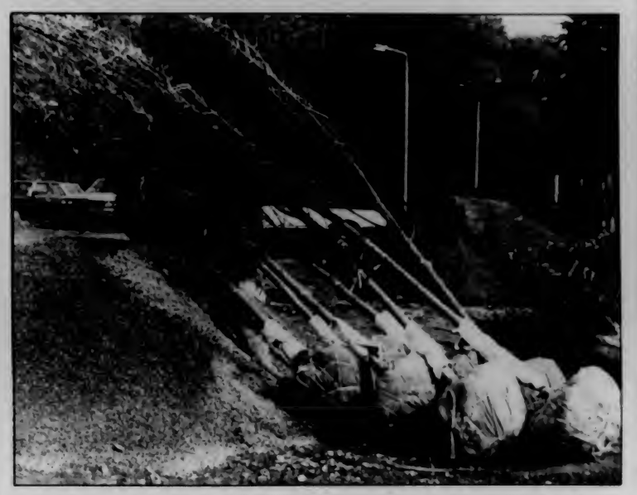
The Student Government Association worked to win back partial litigation rights to the Legal Service Center on campus in a meeting last night.

Senators were urged to get involved through lobbying members of the Arts, Humanities, and Education Committee in the state legislature or participating in other strategies to win support for the litigation bill.

"Overall, we have an excellent chance," said Student Trustee Al Lizana. "This is the closest we've ever come."

The Legal Services Office (LSO) was established in 1974 to represent students in need of legal service and representation against outside parties as well as the University itself.

The Legal Services Center lost all litigation powers in 1987 after a woman took the University to court on the grounds the University violated her civil rights and won the case.



Originally the Board of Trustees annulled the litigation rights of the LSO to represent students against the University. They eventually stripped it of all litigation rights, which is the present condition of the Legal Services Center.

The Legal Services Center is now asking for partial rights to litigation, said Mirran Raphaely, issues coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy and a senator.

"We are not asking for the right to sue the Breakthrough movie has merits questioned

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

"In The Crying Game, Neil Jordon purports to explore sexually uncharted territories, taking us to places we don't know. Yet, sadly, we know this territory well. Unfortunately, Jordon is incapable of taking us to a place where sexuality exists without dominance and degradation," Adam Thorburn told about 30 people on Wednesday afternoon.

Thorburn, an MFA student in theater at Sarah Lawrence College, was asked to UMass as part of the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Studies Brown Bag Series. His lecture, a critique of the aforementioned film, was entitled "Dressing and Undressing: The Crying Game."

"It takes a man to wear a dress like that," famed drag entertainer Charles Pierce used to say. A statement echoed by many people in response to last year's Academy Award winning film The Crying Game. The film is about a former Irish Republican Army member, Fergus (played by Stephen Rea), who escapes to London where he falls for Dil (played by Jaye Davidson), his attractive hairdresser. It is the basic Hollywood boy-meets-girl action-adventure story with a twist, the most talked about, now legendary plot twist ever: girl is really another boy.

The film was lauded by critics for tackling such bold subject matter as transvestitism, homosexuality, and intraracial romance. Advertisements for the film proclaimed, "100 critics agree The Crying Game is one of 1992's 10 best films."

Ironically, it was the critics' praise of The Crying Game as a progressive film that led Thorburn to it. He was disappointed, "The film proports to be progressive, to stretch our ideas of gender and racial boundaries in relationships but it fails to bring that out," Thorburn said.

Thorburn argues the film is not progressive in its portrayal of female gender. "To be granted humanity, to be accepted as female, Dil embodies societies most oppressive ideas of what a woman is," Thorburn said.

Thorburn illustated his points by showing scenes from the film. In one Dil allows Fergus to cut off her hair to disguise her from the IRA.

Dil's hair was the essence of her feminine identity. By relinquishing it, by her willingness to be destroyed by the man she loves Dil embodies society's masochistic expectations for woman's romantic love," Thorburn said.

Thorburn disputes the idea that the film is daring in its portrayal of a homosexual relationship.

"Fergus' heterosexuality is never threatened because he is always the "man" in the relationship, Dil continues to play the passive female role," he said.

Thorburn felt the film was unworthy of the praise it received as an interracial romance. He said he felt that Jordan used people of color as a backdrop for a White story.

"Dil is the 'tragic mullato' Jordan uses racial hierarchy to further increase Dil's inferiority," Thorburn said.

Women's shelter at risk

By VANESSA AMIN
Collegian Correspondent

A Northampton women's shelter may have to close due to a new policy by the Department of Social Services.

Necessities/Necesidades Women's Shelter has housed battered women and their children for many years and now may have to close, said Christina Sheppard, an advocate volunteer for the shelter.

The new policy, which is still being negotiated, states that the shelter must stay open 24 hours with staff physically on duty, seven days a week. As of right now, the staff and volunteers have set hours. However, if they are not present at the actual shelter, they can be contacted through beepers.

"We are always available, just not in a physical sense," Sheppard said.

According to Sheppard, the shelter has four full-time and two half-time staff members with approximately 60 volunteers. The shelter does not have the funds to have staff on duty 24 hours, Sheppard said.

The shelter is funded approximately 55 percent by the Department of Social Services (DSS), 12 percent by United Way, and the rest by fund raising and donations. Since DSS is their major donator, there is no way the shelter can afford to stay open with out more funding by the DSS.

"We are the only women's shelter in Hampshire County and if we have to close down, there will be no other shelter to help out these battered women," Sheppard said.

Every year the shelter signs a contract with DSS and this year the new policy may go into effect. According to Sheppard, if people in the community helped by voicing their opinions and taking some kind of action, maybe DSS will not implement this new policy.

She encourages people to show their support by writing to Governor William Weld and Linda Carlisle, commissioner of the department of social services, and said she could provide people with the addresses if need be.

Library shuttle back on campus

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Correspondent

The Research Library Council in cooperation with the vice chancellor for administration and finance have come together to bring the Library Shuttle back to the University of Massachusetts campus.

Last semester the shuttle was used on a trial run. Once the students learned about the service, it was utilized frequently. Because of its success, the shuttle has started to run again this semester.

Allan Byam, manager of Transit Services, said the shuttle was created in order to provide further safety for students.

"Our primary concern is of the people using the library and getting to their dorms safely," Byam said.

Many complaints were made about the cost of the shuttle, but the Research Library Council pressured to keep the shuttle running.

"The shuttle is very costly, yet it is worth it because it provides a great deal of safety for the students," Byam said.

The Library Shuttle parallels the escort service, concentrating on picking students up from the library only.

"The escort service is pretty much over-burdened because a lot of people are using it. Students have to wait quite awhile to get one," Byam said.

The Transit Department operates the Library Shuttle buses. "We have our own vehicles sponsored by the Transit Service, which is a department of the University. We have a pool of almost 200 drivers," he said.

"We do the similar campus shuttle route; to parking lots, to Orchard Hill, and all of the other dorms," Byam said.

The van travels the Orchard Hill Loop 1 shuttle route. It will not stop at the E-Lot/Stadium or E-Lot/Lot 25 unless students request it.

"A lot of times I want to take the escort service to my dorm, but they are so backed up I end up waiting a long time. Usually, I end up walking home," said Tanja Streidt, a UMass sophomore.

"I am excited to have the Library Shuttle available. I think this new system will be great," Streidt said.

This service is available for students Sunday through Thursday.

Editorial/Opinion

Images of perfection

Sex smells. Blondes, cleavage, nudity, rear shots, shots, makeup, thin, and beautiful is how they often appear. Browse any magazine and the advertisements scream perfection. But is this a true representation of how Americans look?

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

The advertisement industry has focused in on the human body as a piece of art, on display for all the world to see. Men and women in these ads offer images that consumers want to emulate. These ads aren't selling a product, rather they are selling an image while at the same time dictating to us the way we should look.

It's no wonder why so many American men and women suffer from some form of eating disorder. Turn on the television and all you see is Nutra-System, Jenny Craig, Weight Watchers, and Slim Fast ads. In order to be perfect you must be thin. Once you have achieved that goal you can then say you are perfect.

It all boils down to who you are and who you want to be or be like. Girls are constantly aware of how they appear on the outside. However, this isn't limited to women alone. Men are just as self-conscious and aware of their appearance as women are of theirs.

Remember you can only make a first impression once so you might as well look your darn-gone best, right? And if you're not satisfied with what God gave you at birth there is always plastic and cosmetic surgery. Hey, what's a tuck here, a lift there, and a reshaping over here? Nothing is wrong with altering your features.

If there is something you don't like about yourself change it. You deserve to be happy with who you are and how you look. So, if plastic surgery is going to make you look the way you want to look, go for it.

The ad industry does dictate images to us and that may be bad because the images we are given are only images of perfection. Have you ever seen the cover of a magazine with a fat man or woman with bad skin and gross hair? No, I haven't either, maybe that is not the way we are told to look.

However, the ad industry does owe America something: reality. You can easily make an ugly thin person beautiful with a little makeup and some good air brushing. So, why doesn't the ad industry do the same for overweight people?

The answer is because fat and ugly doesn't sell. Sex and beauty sell. So, that is what we are going to be given and probably always will.

People need to realize that you can have everything in the world, especially material things and great looks, and still can be considerably unhappy. Just because you are beautiful doesn't necessarily mean you are happy with yourself. You have to learn to judge yourself before you judge others.

Beauty is only skin deep. Remember always dress to impress and then we can say "you've got the look."

Strip bar ads sell women

I was deeply disturbed last Thursday morning to open the Collegian and discover a large advertisement for Anthony's Pub, and a smaller one for the Race St. Pub, two strip bars, especially since the majority of the editors at the Collegian are women who are forced to confront the consequences of sexism every day.

Unlike Scott's Liquors, which sells beer; Judie's, which sells food; or Stanley Kaplan, which sells good SAT scores, Anthony's Pub and the Race St. Pub are in the business of selling women.

Melanie
DESILVA

While most people would agree that it is absurd to think of a human being as a consumer good, the existence of the sex industry indicates that women are, suggesting the terms "human" and "woman" are incompatible.

It is hard to believe that a debate over whether to include these advertisements in the Collegian is occurring. Certainly an advertisement for the KKK or a similar racist organization would not be printed; certainly an advertisement for Anthony's Pub which read "exotic dancer Native Joe with a wild jungle-like aura and long black dong will excite you" would never be printed because it is outrageously racist.

Why, when blatant racism would not be tolerated in Collegian advertisements, would blatant mysogeny be exempt from the enforcement of equality and justice?

The sex industry is a multi-billion dollar global institution of oppression which not only generates "exotic dancing," but also prostitution, pornography, and the mail-order bride service.

It was created by and perpetuates patriarchy, generating an atmosphere of violence and subordination, in which all women are seen as sexual objects. It is like a supermarket where men can choose from a variety of different brands of women in a myriad of formats, be it stage, video, in the bedroom, or at the altar.

There are reasons why women choose to strip and those reasons are grounded in oppression. In fact, given the context of power relations within which women must choose to work in the sex industry, one must question to what extent it is a choice.

Women, in general, don't strip because it is a nice career option they found in the Mather Career Center Unisex Occupational Catalog; they don't do it because it will increase their self-esteem. They do it because they are poor, because they need to put themselves through school, because they live in a society which has taught women that their only value is through the eyes of men, and that their only power is through the sale of their bodies.

Often, women in Third World nations are forced into the sex industry because "development projects" funded by the U.S. mechanized industries that have traditionally employed women, forcing them into the only other occupation available.

The chances are that Raquel Darian and Barbie Bridges are not selling themselves because they like it and would do it even if they had the chance to go to Yale, but because patriarchy has created an environment in which women have limited, unequal options from men to survive.

For those who would accuse me of advocating censorship, they use the term "advocate" as if censorship did not already exist. But the fact is that through women's economic and political exclusion, we are silenced — silenced from effectively counteracting the message that women are property.

To obtain substantial access to the male-controlled billion dollar media institution, in particular, one needs tremendous economic power.

Lacking the global wealth necessary to purchase time, advertising space, and programming spots, women are prevented from even disseminating an alternative to the pervasive message offered by the sex industry. In essence, lack of equal access equals censorship.

The fact is when there is no longer a real choice involved in deciding whether to be involved in a relationship, that relationship becomes one of slavery.

The Collegian should not be in the business of advertising the sexual slavery of women, and has the obligation to every women on this campus to choose not to print these advertisements.

Melanie DeSilva is a UMass student.

Rejecting our history won't change our culture's future

Editor's note: This opinion piece appeared in the Boston Globe on Wednesday, Oct. 20, and is reprinted with permission.

The P^{C} posse rode again last week — this time at UMass-Amherst, where some students demanded a new school symbol because the Minuteman is "sexist, racist and militaristic." Oh, my aching diversity! Who will be next — Santa Claus for being offensive to the overweight community? George Washington for being environmentally insensitive? The Green Mountain Boys for not being girls?

To his credit, the UMass chancellor, David Scott, vetoed the request, I hope he goes one better and sits everybody down for a session in sweet reason, which is usually missing whenever political correctness comes up. He should also talk about history, which happened a long time ago, even back before these kids were in junior high school.

Gloria Steinem was not on the lecture circuit in 1775, Martin Luther King did not have his dream. The military had not yet purchased one smart bomb or $500 toilet seat. The country was raw and hard. The Minutemen were doing the best with what they had, which wasn't much, unless you count youth, bravado and courage.

Maybe some of them drank too much. They were not enlightened about the rights of indigenous peoples. The Revolution was fought by rowdies and opportunists as well as patriots and brilliant minds. The ideal had warts.

But a nation did emerge because a group of men (yes, they were men in those days) stood ready to fight the British on a minute's notice. Commemorating that effort in a symbol is not condoning sexism, racism or militarism. It is simply tipping a hat to the people who came before us.

Would the protesters at UMass consider ripping the pictures of their great grandparents out of the family album because they were not sophisticated about race relations? Should the classic immigrant portrait — Papa seated, Mama standing, six kids pressing against her skirt — be crumpled and burned because it did not show her dressed for success and heading out the door to the consulting job?

Susan
TRAUSCH

What about the baby pictures of the protesters? Not much depth evident in the toothless little faces. As two-year-olds they were probably real brats and (gasp!) hit people. So perhaps we should expunge that violence form the record and replace it with pictures of the mature 1993 self.

Just one problem. The mature 1993 self might see, all wrong in 2015 or 2025 if society moves on to other standards and concerns. Maybe we better forget the self, or any human beings, and go with pictures of avocados. They're more consistent.

"The most effective way to change a culture is to change its symbols," Martin Jones told The Globe last week. He organized the UMass movement and pushed for an inanimate mascot. He's young. He thinks he's righting the wrongs of the world. Someday he will see that a culture changes in its heart through experience and growth, not by rejecting the past. He is part of the drive that is trying to sanitize life, censoring any emotion that is not bland, eliminating any hero who would not be approved by a committee.

Committees want no creche on the square during the holidays, even if it's next to a menorah, a Buddhist shrine and a plaque that says atheists don't have to buy any of it.

Committees nix Invocations at commencement exercises, no matter how inclusive of all faiths the prayers may be. They banish the Brothers Grimm from the grade school library — too many monsters and too much blood. They won't even allow a slave ship replica in the harbor. They won't even allow people to say "slave." Not a nice word.

But that's the point of saying it — knowing it was bad and knowing what happened to people. To know is not to revere. To know is to be able to separate symbols of hate, oppression, or obscenity from symbols that merely recall another time. Putting a Minuteman on a football shirt is not the same as putting the auction block there or putting Adolf Hitler there.

The UMass protesters should save their energies for problems that exist. They should drop out of that throng of noisy Americans who stand ready to demand their rights on a minute's notice instead of using their heads.

UMass anti-Semitism daily reminder of WWII horror

My grandparents, on my mom's side, are traditionally old-fashioned, speak to each other in Dutch, and still after all these years haven't quite gotten the hang of American customs. They have been here for almost 50 years, yet a part of them still longs for their homeland, the Netherlands. They came to America a long time ago to try to restart their lives, but they will never forget what brought them to America in the first place.

My grandparents consider themselves to be lucky, not for the usual reasons that we consider ourselves to be lucky, they consider themselves lucky to be alive. I don't think that a day goes by that they don't appreciate every thing they have and think back to the time when they had nothing at all. My grandparents are indeed among the lucky ones (and in this case lucky is a relative term), for they are alive. They managed to survive a concentration camp during World War II.

After my grandparents were first married, just at the outbreak of World War II, they were awoken in the middle of the night by a knock at the door and hauled off to a concentration camp by Nazis, who felt all Jewish people deserved to die. It came as no surprise, for most of their family was already in concentration camps.

They remained in various concentration camps for many months watching their friends and family die. My grandparents know first-hand about the gas chambers, the lineups to decide who will live or die, the soap made of human fat, and the lamp shades of human skin.

They watched as their sisters and brothers were killed in these camps, and witnessed the mutilation of their loved ones. They watched in horror and in silence, knowing that they could die at any time at the whim of any Nazi. They waited in these camps, wondering how the world had let one man become powerful enough to try and kill of an entire race of people. They waited and they watched wondering when these horrors would end, and what would become of them.

Stephanie
EISENBERG

My grandparents managed to survive these horrors. They are among the few, and were able to escape from the camp. They escaped in the middle of the night, just the two of them. The rest of the family was already dead. My grandfather had been smart, he had managed to sneak several thousands of dollars in diamonds into the camp with him, and he somehow, someway managed to keep them hidden, until the night of their escape. It is truly a wonder in itself that he managed to sneak in the diamonds, let alone keep them hidden for such an extensive amount of time.

With the diamonds he had hidden, my grandfather was able to buy him and my grandmother passage to America on a cattle boat. My grandparents arrived in America knowing very little about American customs. The only thing they knew was that they had each other, because everyone else was killed in the war. They were alone, they had watched as their friends and family perished at the hands of the Germans.

A few years ago, I traveled to the Holocaust museum in Israel, and I got to see some of the horrors my grandparents had endured. I watched helplessly as my mother cried throughout the memorial service, knowing that every relative she would have had was dead, killed at the hands of the Germans.

And I cried when my dad took me into the archives where they keep the records of who was killed in the war. Under my family name alone there are thirteen pages. Thirteen pages filled with my family's names of those who perished at the hands of Hitler. Thirteen pages of just my family...

In recent weeks there have been numerous anti-Semitic acts on this campus. These acts have upset and outraged the community as they are acts of hate specifically aimed at the Jewish population.

We must combat these acts with education and power, because it is only after we understand why these acts are so powerful can we begin to fight them. Six million Jews died in the Holocaust because of anti-Semitism.

They died at the whim of one man, while the world looked on, too horrified to do anything. We can not and will not let that happen again. My grandparents suffered and lost too much for me to stand back and watch it happen again.

Each and every anti-Semitic act is a reminder of the Holocaust, and what happened to millions and millions of Jews. Hate can not be tolerated. There is simply too much at stake.

Peace Corps — over CIA?

I'm sitting around a certain restaurant in Amherst Center last week, enjoying a delicious $6 steak and cheese sub, when I inadvertently heard one of the most shocking conversations in my life. The words uttered still affect me today.

"So, William, what are you going to do after you graduate this year?" the maternal friend-of-the-family sitting adjacent to us asked a guy my age.

"Well, the CIA has recruited me, but I don't think I'm going into that line of work," the college toolbox replied.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Immediately, I was about to choke on my sub, and after paying an arm and a leg for it, I tried my hardest not to die — but that was only half of the conversation.

"Actually, I've been looking into the Peace Corps, and I might go into that," he said.

Bells went off like there was a three-alarm fire in my head. My Spider-Sense was definitely tingling non-stop. At this point, it was a matter of not vomiting what I had already swallowed of the sub.

The Peace Corps? Over the CIA?

Now, I don't mean to spend the rest of this editorial trashing the Peace Corps, but what was this kid thinking?

The Central Intelligence Agency is one of the only agencies in the United States government which actually does any work. Many of the other agencies seem to waste billions of taxpayer dollars, but the CIA is the most vigorous bureaucratic agency around.

For those of you who may not understand what the CIA is, and why it may be a better organization to work for than the Peace Corps. If I break down the organization into the three words that compose it, do you think you may understand it?

Central: The first word which the CIA stands for is the word "Central." This means the CIA is the intelligence agency which is all-encompassing in the United States. The CIA reports to the president, not the secretary of state, and its role is to cover all intelligence in our country and abroad.

If you get a job in the CIA, chances are you'll stay in the greatest country in the world. Even if you have to go abroad, you won't be living in some shack half-starving, you'll be on official business of our country.

Intelligence: This is what I hoped my peer was using in deciding his life's plans. Intelligence means gathering facts so our government can have information from which to make decisions. Without such information, our government gets into sticky situations that embarrass us all.

Former members of the CIA include President George Bush, William Casey, and Oliver North. All of these men... well, enough said, they are all true patriots.

Agency: The CIA is an agency. That means you work for and get paid by the government. What better way to serve the country which gave you life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

Now let's look into the Peace Corps. It was established by President John F. Kennedy, whose family has led a long legacy of wasting money on social programs that don't help the people they should.

The Peace Corps does not pay you. You have to waste two years of your life. It is also funded by the U.S., and is also an agency, but you get to help a third-world country instead of working on our own country's problems (I know you all agree the U.S. has problems).

No wonder they call it "the toughest job you'll ever love." To those still not convinced on the CIA's merits, they would deem it "the toughest job you'll ever hate."

At least you may be able to reach the Oval Office from the CIA, which is better than making lots of friends with people you'll never see again.

Right to sue vital to Legal Services

I have just received the University's annual appeal to alumni for money.

In 1987, while I was a student, the University trustees removed litigation rights from the Legal Services Office, as an office paid for with student fees.

It is my opinion that the trustees stripped the LSO of its power to represent students in order to protect local businesses and landlords who frequently exploit students with unfair business and rental practices.

LSO lawyers are skilled attorneys, particularly in the areas of civil liberties, civil rights, housing, and consumer protection. Considering the university environment, LSO expertise is essential, not only in helping students afford justice, but also to empower them, often to the embarrassment of the University. This does not sit well with the trustees.

Six years ago the University said that the LSO's right to litigation created disharmony within the system. In reality, the LSO creates harmony by working for the health and well-being of the campus community. Disharmony is created by those people who do not respect a student's civil liberties and are afraid of student rights.

I encourage all UMass students and employees to contact your state senators and representatives to support Senate Bill 301 and its companion bill in the House. As I have written in the past, I cannot consider a donation to the University until litigation is restored to the LSO.

Everywoman's Center director a woman of great commitment

It is unfortunate that Shyamala Ivatury chose to attack the mission, politics, and particularly the director of a truly successful program, the Everywoman's Center. I am sure that the hundreds of women, including many women of color, who have called the hotline at all hours of the day and night, wondered at the vituperation of her tone.

Carol Wallace has stood in the forefront of women's issues during her career at EWC; her commitment is well known. As with the programs of all organizations in state-funded institutions, the EWC has indeed been troubled by lack of funds.

Carol and her staff have had to respond to some difficult decisions, some of them mandated by administrative moves that were out of their control.

Throughout fiscal disasters, however, the EWC has never lost sight of its mission, nor neglected its mandated, to be completely accessible to a wide, broad-based community of women.

The EWC's new Women of Color Program, which was created to address more specifically the needs of the community of minority women, is just one of the innovative changes instituted by a creative staff.

I have always found Carol Wallace, and her staff, to be persons who are willing to listen to and implement programmatic changes in positive ways that serve as many women as possible. I invite all persons in the five-college area to visit the Everywoman's Center, and to avail themselves of its services.

Collegian has acted irresponsibly

I feel compelled to respond to Michael Morrissey's recent article, "AIDS money" [Collegian, Oct. 15]. Normally I don't waste my time reading such tripe, let alone responding to it, but Mr. Morrissey's unconscionable homophobia and AIDSphobia and his blatant misrepresentation of the facts has forced me to respond.

First, may I say that I am appalled by the lack of knowledge displayed by someone who is supposed to be "college educated." I am equally appalled that the Collegian would legitimize this sort of misinformation by printing Mr. Morrissey's article.

I shan't discuss his arguments that gays choose to be gay. Who knows? Who cares? While the biology vs. social debate may be quite interesting, why should we spend time trying to invalidate people's lives and existences debating a question which has no answers? But, if I may paraphrase Chancellor David Scott's speech at the National Coming Out Day rally last Wednesday, sexuality is a continuum and at different times in our lives, we identify differently.

I also shan't discuss Mr. Morrissey's (mis)representation of the history of HIV transmission in the United States and the world. While HIV first appeared in the gay and bisexual male community in this country, it was concurrently being spread through heterosexual populations in many other countries.

Nor shall I discuss his suggestion that heterosexuals are immune to HIV. While I prefer to use more scholarly tomes for my research, Mr. Morrissey apparently prefers to do his research while waiting in the check-out line in the grocery store. Reader's Digest would not be my first source for getting information on AIDS.

According to the World Health Organization, heterosexual transmission accounts for the majority of the new HIV cases. In fact, in 1992, heterosexual contact was the cause for the greatest percentage of the increase of AIDS cases. Currently, it is estimated that over 1 million Americans are HIV positive, that is one out of every 250 people. By the year 2000, we will all know someone who is living with HIV or AIDS.

I would, however, like to say that I am dismayed that the Collegian would print this article. I am also deeply disturbed that Mr. Morrissey can blatantly bash lesbian and gay people in his articles and remain a columnist for the Collegian.

Obviously the Collegian uses some sort of discretion in what they print. Would the Collegian print an article in defense of slavery? Would the Collegian print an article denying that the Holocaust ever happened? Would the Collegian print an article that said that raping women is OK? Why are stories bashing gays and lesbians acceptable to the Collegian while others aren't?

As someone who has lived through this pandemic, who has watched too many of her friends die because of this disease, and who has lobbied the government and pharmaceutical companies to develop vaccines and drugs to stop the progression of this disease, I am offended by both Mr. Morrissey's assertion that gay people are expendable to this society and the Collegian's willingness to print it.

An exclusive for the Collegian the Deputy Minister of Agriculture of Israel speaks on Peace in the Middle East.

Walid Sadik: "Bearing a Double Burden"

On October 7, Walid Sadik, Israel's Deputy Minister of Agriculture, made a spontaneous visit to the University of Massachusetts. In a discussion with an Islamic history class and in a personal interview, he answered student questions about the recent Israeli-Palestinian peace accord.

A week earlier Sadik had traveled to Tunis, where he met with Yasser Arafat, to Mexico City where he spoke to an anti-nuclear conference of physicians about the recent accord.

Speaking to the students, Sadik, an Israeli-Palestinian who was born in Palestine in 1940, described himself as being in a very unique position and as bearing a double burden. As an Israeli citizen and knesset (parliament) member, he feels a loyalty to his own Palestinian people.

Analysis

By B. A. Cannistraro

As both a Palestinian and an Israeli official, Sadik said that in the past years of violence and fighting between the Jews and Palestinians, he has been torn by both sides. Jews accused him of being pro-PLO, and Palestinians accused him of being a Zionist agent.

As a person belonging to both sides, Sadik told the Mexico City conference of physicians that he has "worked for years to mediate and reconcile between the two peoples." He expressed his whole-hearted support for and surprise at the recent accord, which he described as a "bomb of peace."

In light of Palestinian suspicion and resentment for the accord, Sadik asserted that he is not a Zionist. He does, however, belong to the Meretz party coalition, which, according to reports in Middle Eastern International and New Outlook magazine, is committed to "Humanist Zionism."

Definitions of Zionism vary greatly, but the term is usually associated with a belief in the inalienable right to existence of a Jewish state in Israel. Humanist Zionists usually define this state by the borders established in 1948, making the West Bank and Gaza territories (occupied in 1967) negotiable.

Sadik said that although the Jewish members of his party are Zionist, he is not. As proof of its non-Zionist appeal, Sadik added that approximately 40,000 of the country's 800,000 Palestinian israelis voted for the Meretz coalition. The coalition voted in favor of the deportation of more than 400 suspected Muslim militants in December 1992. Sadik insisted that he was personally and publicly opposed to the deportation.

Throughout his classroom discussion and interview, Sadik emphasized that the United States needs to financially support Israel in its move toward peace. This support would be directed at ending Palestinian poverty, and would be in addition to the more than $ 3 billion per year that Israel already receives in American aid. Sadik explained that financial stability is a buffer against Muslim fanaticism, which he said threatens American oil interests in the area.

According to Sadik, a poor economy is the source of the radicalism to which people turn as a solution to poverty and despair.

"Muslim fanatics are worse than just fanatics," Sadik said, mentioning that the Palestinian militant party Hamas is funded by Iran, an American antagonist. When pressed by Professor Yvonne Haddad of the History Department, however, Sadik conceded that the Likud party (the conservative Israeli party heading the government from the start of the Palestinian uprising in 1987 until 1992)..."supported and financed the Hamas in the occupied territories."

Sadik pointed to instability in other countries of the Middle East as examples for why the United States should send Israel financial support. "I am very worried that in Cairo it is very easy" for terrorist attacks and popular revolution to occur.

In contrast to Sadik's concern, the New York Times reported on September 20 that tourism in Egypt is expected to increase in the next year and that the Hilton corporation is currently investing in a new hotel and resort properties there. According to the report, the State Department issued advisories last August against American travel to most Mideast countries, but stated that in Egypt, "incidents do not appear to be directed at tourist targets. Three tourists were killed in Egypt last year. In Florida, nine tourists were killed within one year.

To Sadik, the peace accord is a first step towards peace in the Middle East. He emphasized the importance of American financial aid, but also said that there will be no future for Israel if it regards itself as part of Europe or America and not part of the Middle East.

University," she said.

Other attempts have been made to restore litigation power to the center, but Speaker Matt Pavesi told students they are the closest they have come in seven years to win back litigation.

This is one battle the students of the University of Massachusetts can win," he said.

The bill goes before the Education Committee next Wednesday, Oct. 27, said Senator Amy Lloyd.

The fight to win back litigation rights is a two-fold fight, lobbying both the legislature and the trustees, according to Lizana.

Lizana estimated eight of the 24 trustees are friendly to the issue, but he said one is definitely "hostile."

However, he added the trustees have not committed to any position and they could change their minds.

The trustees are basing their argument against giving back litigation to Legal Services because they claim it is bad public relations for a state agency to sue another state municipality, according to Lizana.

"It is litigation by convenience when it come to the Board of Trustee," Pavesi said.

Raphaely said the center wants to represent students in a court of law, but not against the University.

The SGA will be working with other organizations on campus to work towards achieving litigation rights.

Despite opposition from students at the meeting, supported by directors of other legal services programs and the general counsel of the Massachusetts Bar Association, the Trustees approved the proposal.

In the fall of 1986, student represented by private counsel sued the University over the August decision, alleging that it was made in retaliation for the student's exercise of civil and constitution rights. In August 1987, the Trustees voted to "abolish" LSO, and create a new "Legal Services Center" that was prohibited from representing students in any litigation whatsoever.

After the vote, the Chair of the Board said, "The University exists for students, of course, but we also exist to protect our administrators from [legal] actions."

To the surprise of everyone, the federal court then dismissed the student's lawsuit, and this decision was upheld by the First Circuit Court of Appeals.

Rowell does not do so alone, however. Professor Peter Tanner, also of the Department of Music and Dance, helps Rowell assemble and coordinate the event.

"Peter and I determine the sequence of who is going to perform when, and in what order," said Rowell, "and we pace it so that the fast songs and the slow songs, the loud songs and the soft songs compliment each other. Each group performs for maybe five to seven minutes, so it's not too much of one thing."

Although Rowell and Tanner manage all the details of the concert, each faculty member who directs one of the musical groups chooses which piece will best present the group's musical talent.

Rowell asserts that the concert is different now than it was 19 years ago because the students of today are better musicians than those of the past.

"The biggest difference is the quality of work the students are doing," said Rowell.

The 19th Annual Multiband Pops Concert will be held on Friday in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at 8 p.m. Tickets are on sale at the F.A.C. Box Office for $4 for students with ID and senior citizens, $8 for all others. Call 545-2511 for more information.

Morgan found, for schools with the greater percentage of African-American students to have Channel One.

"A recent Department of Education report points to the increasing divisions in society between the haves and have-nots based on income and race," Morgan said.

According to Morgan, by giving people the illusion that it is providing resources, the Whittle program may actually be widening the gap.

UNPLUG, a new national youth-led organization, is working for commercial-free equal education. Officials say they sponsored the 25-page study as part of their efforts to expel Channel One from public classrooms and promote community control of public schools.

"The Whittle program is used not to complement but to replace texts and other instructional material when these resources are most lacking," said Morgan.

Whittle is based in Knoxville, Tenn. They first tested Channel One in 1989. Sources say in past weeks the news element has focused on Somalia and Haiti with a slant intended to interest teenagers. The ads promote such products as fast foods, PG-rated movies, and acne medicine.

make the educational experience of African and African-American students relevant.

Fonville said that this was done by providing a cultural background and experience with which students of African descent could relate. She said that this event is the first of a series of events which would help engender this experience.

Moss, in her keynote address, encouraged all students, particularly students of African descent, to look "inside themselves" and realize that they are the "descendants of kings and queens." Moss said this meant the students studying here at this university are continuing the work that was already begun by their ancestors.

The evening was a celebration of the African presence on the campus, according to Moss. Her speech began with a brief chronology of the history of African-Americans from Africa through slavery to present day citizenship. Moss then went on to disclose why some students of color, few in number on this campus, harbor inner hostilities.

Moss said that the students may carry hostile feelings with them because they are in complete isolation from cultural surroundings. One way to remedy this isolation, she suggested, was to strengthen community relationships.

The formation of the Association of African Heritage Graduate Students, for example, and other community organizations was a way of dissipating a sense of cultural isolation, she said.

Moss said that once the feeling of isolation disappeared, a student could then focus upon acquiring their degree.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Look forward to increased social popularity in the weeks ahead. You immediately feel at home with a newcomer who speaks your language. Take care of much needed home repairs. Delay could prove costly.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Self-discipline helps you get along with difficult co-workers. An unexpected event brings financial rewards or valuable tokens of affection. Show your appreciation for favors.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Today's events set the stage for some profound changes. A lively exchange of ideas with someone special could lead to a permanent alliance. For peace of mind, keep a loved one's secrets.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Keep close tabs on what is happening behind the scenes. Postpone negotiating pivotal agreements. Family affairs or real estate matters begin to look brighter. Take the first step to mend emotional rifts.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Include your partner when making plans involving financial rewards or a job promotion. Examine any contracts very carefully before signing — consult a lawyer if necessary.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): An upsurge of energy improves your job performance. The news from afar is favorable. You may get to take a trip. Renew your passport. Aim for quality in your friendships.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Travel or distant interests are suddenly in the spotlight. Although an aggressive attitude pays off in the market place, romance demands a more subtle approach. Curb a tendency to be extravagant.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A productive day lies ahead. New rapport with a loved one means smooth sailing for your social plans. A confidential arrangement can work to your advantage. Be sure your facts are accurate. Don't forget to be your shrewd.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A stimulating new friendship or romance may tempt you to throw caution to the wind. Slow down. Impulsively ending an old relationship for a new one could be a big mistake.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A new project or family activity may require more attention than you expected. Luckily, your creativity is at a peak. You come up with a brilliant solution.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your emphasis on getting tasks done early helps you beat the clock. Your sparkling wit wins the spotlight at a social or professional event. You find the perfect way to please loved ones.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You delight in the results of bridging the gap with persons at a distance. Almost anywhere you hang your hat feels like home. Resist the urge to use arm-twisting tactics on your co-workers.

Tennis ends season on up note

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team had no trouble disposing of Bentley College Tuesday in its final match of the fall season. The Minutemen lost only in first doubles while sweeping six singles matches and taking the other two doubles matches. UMass finished its comeback season 3-2.

UMass shook up its lineup for this season-ending rubber match with the Falcons. Joe Twer, who was 0-2 playing sixth singles, could be found playing fourth singles Tuesday. The switch worked as Twer made quick work of Greg Moore, 6-2, 6-2.

"It was easy," assistant coach David Kleniman said of the senior's first win.

Sasha Bluestone and Kevin Hicks, the third doubles tandem all season long, not only won their doubles match 6-3, 4-6, 6-2 against Moore and Kevin Taylor, but they also captured their first career singles victories in the fifth and sixth slots, respectively.

"Sasha and Kevin are both excellent players and they proved it," Kleinman said. Bluestone teased Greg Farland in the first set, winning by a 6-4 count, before notching a "bagel" in the second, 6-0. Hicks erased Carlos Gari in the opposite manner, 6-0, 6-3.

Kasper Vaala concluded a perfect 5-0 campaign with a straight set knockout of Bentley's best offering, Greg Bowser, 7-5, 6-2. The pride of Hellerup, Denmark must now polish his doubles game for the Rolex Eastern Collegiate Championships, to be held November 5-8 in Princeton, New Jersey.

Keith Murray, scheduled to replace Vaala for first singles competition in Princeton, scored a much needed win in third singles, where he wasted Luis Jove, 6-1, 6-1.

"That was the best [Murray]'s played all year," Kleinman said. "Keith didn't miss a shot."

Ankur Baishya was all business as well, as Suen Anderson found out in the blue-chip freshman's 6-2, 6-2 pasting.

his headphones at last weekend's UConn game and he's sure to be in prime screeching voice for this week's game with the Delaware Fightin' Blue Hens.

By the way, Fagerson's been bragging about the tie he's going to pull out on Saturday for Homecoming as a sure winner for the Cravat King contest. He's been talking it up since Homecoming 1978 (what a season) and bets are it's about that old. Also letting it be known that he wants the throne is Marty "The Hitchhiker" Dobrow. Dobrow must be watched, he's very sly.

• Is Delaware really called the Blue Hens? They must have had a PC battle on their campus too — and lost. Do blue hens create blue eggs? Dr. Seuss would love it, blue eggs and ham. How'd Dr. Seuss get in here?

• I think Fagerson and George Miller would agree, Vin Scully is a radio man's radio man.

• Coach John Calipari wants you, the best fans in the country, to be on hand for Midnight Madness.

• As Chancellor I try to answer all the mail received by my office, personally. But the response from last week was overwhelming. There were two gems, though.

James Walsh, who knew I didn't mind if his letter wasn't typed or double spaced, wants to appease everyone with "The W.E.B. DuBois Reds." Walsh used some colorful literary devices in his proposal and while I, as Chancellor, cannot make the final decision, we appreciate his input. Everyone deserves to be heard.

Robert Mullen (not Mallen or Mullins) wants to honor alum Bill Cosby by changing the Minuteman to the "Brown Hornet," which was created by The Cos. Either that, Rob wrote, or the "tomatoes." Thanks to all our respondents.

• Met a guy by the name of Johnny "The Hanover" Mann last Thursday. He was already sipping Maalox for the Patriots game that was three days away. Johnny is now resting comfortably in intensive care. No more Pats for you, young man.

• How about a nice round of applause for the UMass women's volleyball team which is turning a lot of heads with a very competitive inaugural season.

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on Joe Mallen's boys.

on a counter attack, but the speedy Scurry was able to get back in time.

Scurry made 11 saves when she stayed in the box and recorded her 10th shutout of the season.

Junior forward Melissa Mitchell lead the UMass attack with three shots, all in the second half. Brittany Ballinger took four shots for the Big Green.

This is the second scoreless tie for UMass this season. Against Rutgers, the Minutewomen and the Scarlet Knights played scoreless soccer for 120 minutes.

Saturday, UMass will host what has turned into the biggest game of the year against UConn (12 p.m. start). The game will likely decide what team will host the NCAA Regionals and earn a No. 1 seed.

Last season UConn downed the Minutewomen 1-0 in the regular season and UMass struck back with 2-1 decision in the NCAA first round. Both games were played in Storrs, Conn.

the next game as well.

At 41:02, Dartmouth's Blaine LeGere sent a corner kick to the short side of the net to Geoff Zawtocki, who tapped a quick pass to Cronin to complete the beautiful goal. The rout was on.

The Big Green made it 4-0 at 57:31 when the UMass defense broke down and allowed a two-on-one in front of Reyes. Cronin slipped a pass past Reyes to Chris Mitchell for an easy goal. The UMass offense was totally shut down in the second half.

At 81:54 Mitchell floated a rebound of a Zawtocki shot over Reyes. Players on the field thought the whistle had blown, but the goal was allowed to stand. Dartmouth put one final goal on the board at 82:57 as Mitchell completed the hat trick (his first three goals of the season) off another Cronin pass.

Midnight Madness to be an important night

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts basketball coach John Calipari addresses the media yesterday at Mullins Center about the upcoming Midnight Madness.

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team takes the court for Midnight Madness eight days from now on Friday, October 29 at the William D. Mullins Center, the fun and games of that night will come to mean much more than just a basketball practice.

At least to most people it will.

Because, while the basketball team simply runs up and down the court during a scrimmage doing things which head coach John Calipari "shakes his head at", the importance of Midnight Madness has grown for the University and its students.

ESPN has decided to broadcast portions of the Midnight Madness festivities from three schools. The schools selected were UMass, the storied University of Kentucky, and the defending 1993 NCAA Champion, the University of North Carolina.

Yesterday at a press conference at the Mullins Center, Calipari said being put on national television with Kentucky and North Carolina makes Midnight Madness much more special.

"When you have Kentucky, North Carolina, and UMass together, that means so much," Calipari said.

Besides the usual team scrimmage, the rest of the Midnight Madness lineup of events are still pretty sketchy. Rumor had it that Calipari would be taking off his Armani suit in favor of a uniform so that he could battle it out with Kentucky coach Rick Pitino in a three point shootout, but that appears to be a dead idea.

Instead it looks as though two Minutemen players will take on two Wildcats in the long range contest. As in the past there will be a slam dunk contest, but Calipari said that he is not sure of the format.

One special event of the evening will involve the players in the past who have helped the basketball program get to where it is. Of the 16 players who have played for Calipari over the past four years, 12 will be on hand for a little ceremony at Midnight Madness. Calipari said their presence is important.

"For people who have followed our program it gives them the opportunity not only to see those guys (the former players), but to see what they are doing now, (to see) the jobs that they have."

According to Dave Brown, ESPN's senior program planner, the station will probably be broadcasting two UMass segments during the hour-long show. Bill Raftery will be on hand broadcasting from UMass while Dick Vitale is in North Carolina and Larry Conley is in Kentucky.

One staple that ESPN will bring with it to Midnight Madness involves the students. One lucky student from each school will be chosen to shoot a half-court shot with free tuition and room and board for a year riding on the line.

"This is our opportunity for our region, our University and our program to make a statement," said Calipari. "I just hope it's packed."

No. 8 UMass returns from Dartmouth with a tie

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Long van rides to New Hampshire, in order to play a game of soccer in a chilly rain, can not be considered fun. And it is even less enjoyable when you do not score a goal in the game.

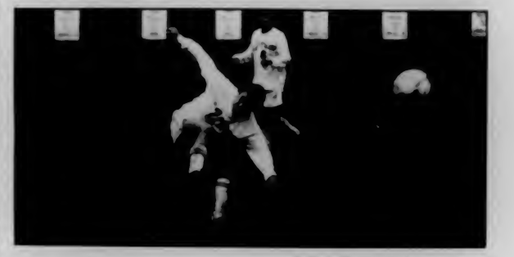
Dartmouth	0

But for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team (11-2-3), the good news is it did not lose to No. 18 Dartmouth, but tied 0-0.

Neither UMass nor Dartmouth were able to muster a goal in either regulation or the 15-minute overtime periods.

The eighth-ranked Minutewomen took the tie on the road, which, while most likely disappointing themselves, is not very damaging in the long run of the season.



Massachusetts is still undefeated against regional competition (6-0-1) and this tie did little to hurt its NCAA chances. Saturday's home match-up against No. 5 Connecticut now just means that much more.

The Big Green (9-1-1) outshot UMass 18-11 and the Minutewomen struggled to keep a sustained attack up against Dartmouth's smothering zone defense.

UMass outcornered Dartmouth 4-3.

The big play down the stretch came in the second overtime when UMass goal keeper Briana Scurry left the net during a corner kick to join the UMass attack as an 11th field player. Dartmouth was able to clear the ball and almost scored

Minutemen fall to Dartmouth

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team suffered a discouraging 6-0 loss to Dartmouth yesterday, snapping the Minutemen's four-game win streak. The Big Green simply dominated the game from start to finish.

Dartmouth	6
Massachusetts	0

UMass was outgunned all afternoon while falling to 6-10. Dartmouth, ranked second in New England, improves to 7-3.

"They are the best team we've played all year," said assistant coach Rob Donnenwirth.

Dartmouth opened the scoring less than seven minutes into the contest as junior Asa Marokus put in a loose ball in the goal mouth off a corner kick. Dartmouth came right back with 37:07 left in the first half when Chris Mitchell scored off a great feed across the front of the goal by Billy Cronin.

"We left (goaltender) Brackie Reyes out to dry of their first two chances, it wasn't his fault," said Donnenwirth.

At 15:58, UMass' Randy Jacobs was open in the box, but the ball skipped by him on the wet grass of Garber Field. Jacobs needs three goals to break the all-time school scoring record; the Minutemen have three games remaining.

With 19:04 left in the half, Matt Edgerly received a red card for kicking a fallen Dartmouth player, forcing the Minutemen to play a man down for the rest of the contest. The red card means an automatic ejection for

Minutewomen hit prime time

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

There promises to be a new wrinkle when the No. 3 University of Massachusetts field hockey team travels to No. 13 Boston University this evening: the game is being played under the lights of Nickerson Field, the first nighttime contest the Minutewomen have had in nearly two years.

According to Massachusetts Coach Pam Hixon, who will be gunning for win No. 250 tonight, facing BU is almost like looking in a mirror.

"BU has tons of speed, and are led by a very quick and experienced forward line," Hixon said.

The BU forward line is led by Chris LaPointe (nine goals, six assists and 24 points) and Anne Maxwell (7,7 and 21).

"Their speed will be a good test for our passing game," Hixon said, "because they are able to get to the ball so quickly and double team."

Another twist the Minutewomen (13-1, 4-0 in the Atlantic 10) will have to contend with is the fact that the game is being played on turf, a surface which Massachusetts is a little unaccustomed to.

"The biggest difference for us will be the pace of the game," Hixon said. "The game is so much faster; you can move up the field much quicker, and the ball travels twice as fast. We have to be prepared for that."

Massachusetts comes into the game led two A-10 Players of the Week, senior co-captain Tara Jelley and freshman keeper Hilary Rose.

Jelley was named the conference's Offensive Player of the Week for her three-goal, one-assist performance last week, and currently ranks fourth in the league in points with 21. Rose picked up her fourth Defensive Player of the Week award for posting three more shutouts last week. Her current goals-against average of 0.16 leads the nation.

UMass madness

As a tribute to Merry Martin and His Ban the Minuteman Clan, this space will also go on hunger strike... until lunch.

• Somewhat overlooked in this whole issue (going to the bathroom is an issue at UMass) has been the effect all of this is having on the Mascot itself. Is it afraid of being attacked? Has its feelings been hurt? What is that thing around its neck?

In what could possibly be the first journalistic endeavor on my part, I tracked down the Minuteman mascot and probed.

The Collegian's Own SCOTT'S SHOTS

"Myself and the other mascot (two people split the duties) think this whole thing is overblown," said the Minuteman, whose identity, like Superman's, will remain anonymous. "If you think about it, you could make a case against any mascot. Is the Boston University Terrier offensive because it has a leash?"

No, it's offensive because of John Silber.

"The mascot is good for the school and everybody's been very supportive saying things like, 'We love you Minuteman.'"

For the record, the Minuteman doesn't carry a gun.

• Boston University head hockey coach Jack Parker had the quote of Hockey East Media Day when asked if he had any advice for UMass coach Joe Mallen, as he prepares to enter the prestigious league.

"Make sure that roof (on Mullins) doesn't blow off," Parker laughed.

• Good to see the U.S. pulling the Rangers out of Somalia. Nolan Ryan is too old for that stuff.

• Mike "Sea Dog" Fagerson was popping out of Elton John Rolls like Thunder into the Valley

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

As the sun goes down behind the William D. Mullins Center tomorrow night, the stage inside the arena will be set for Elton John, "The One" musical act that has sold-out this semester so far.

John's acoustic concert with special guest Ray Cooper should impress the 10,200 in attendance if the performance is anything like past shows. Two summers ago, John and Eric Clapton toured two stadium venues here in the United States, and the performance in New York's Shea was nothing less than spectacular.

Classics such as "Philadelphia Freedom" and "Saturday Night's Alright For Fighting" roused the capacity crowd, with John mixing intensity and flair in these renditions. He also threw in some favorites that never reached his Greatest Hits albums, such as "Tiny Dancer" and "Sacrifice," either of which could have easily been the highlight of the show.

John and his songwriter, Bernie Taupin, have received numerous honors for their work over time, and were recognized with a tribute album, Two Rooms, on which stars such as George Michael (a cover of "Don't Let The Sun Go Down On Me") and The Who (a cover of "Saturday Night") showed their appreciation for the duo.

The mid 80's brought two musical greats, "I'm Still Standing" and "I Guess That's Why They Call It The Blues," which focus on the singer's life and his battle through drug addiction that brought about hard times. In "Blues," John talks about struggling through them and trying to be optimistic.

"Don't wish it away, don't look at it like it's forever/Between you and me I can honestly say that things can only get better."

John's last disc, entitled The One, includes some of the best works he has ever recorded. The title track received a lot of deserved air time, but "The Last Song" could be the singer's most emotional.

"Song" was inspired by Ryan White, a victim of AIDS whom John befriended in his fight to beat the disease. The lyrics come from John's heart, and were written in retrospect to explain White's plea for help.

"Yesterday you came to lift me up/As light as straw and brittle as a bird/Today I weigh less than a shadow on the wall/Just one more whisper of a voice unheard."

Another lesser known off of his latest which explains John's stance on life today is "Simple Life." "Life" is about his attempt to make society better without being looked upon as different.

"But someday soon we'll sail away/To innocence and the bitter end/And I won't break and I won't bend/And with the last breath we ever take/We're gonna get back to the simple life again."

Of course, many know John for his all-time, sing-a-long, songs like "Goodbye Yellow Brick Road", "Candle in the Wind" and "Your Song," the probable finale in which the artist shows his gratitude to all in attendance in a tremendous show-stopper.

Elton John is appearing with Ray Cooper in the Mullins Center, tomorrow night at 8 p.m. Tickets are sold out.

Beverly Hills boneheads

Sixties sitcom whitewash is a hit and miss gagfest

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

The Hollywood high concept machine loves formula. In the early eighties, it was the low-rent slasher flicks. The latter part of that decade saw every possible guise of buddy movies and body switching flicks (Vice Versa anyone?). Presently Tinseltown players are quick to green-light that abundant ore of American pop culture, sixties sitcoms. The latest pre-fab rerun getting the silver screen whitewash is The Beverly Hillbillies.

Following her "out of left field" success with Wayne's World, director Penelope Spheeris adapts the "little story of a man named Jed" to the big screen with mixed results. Though essentially an amiable and often funny "fish out of water" tale, the film never really rises above the sitcom trappings it tries to ridicule.

The story is one heard endlessly before. Country bumpkin Jed (Jim Varney) strikes a bubbling crude (black gold, that is) and attracts the attention of oil investors. He uproots kin and heads for the big city, where his hick attitude towards life clashes with the "sophisticated" customs of the rich (Granny actually tries to serve roadkill stew to the silver spoon-fed Mr. Drysdale). The film then becomes a "who is trying to swindle Jed out of his billions" caper.

Spheeris' film closely adheres to the sixties' sitcom conventions, perhaps too closely. Characters effortlessly top each punchline with a few seconds of camera mugging and scenes abruptly end as if awaiting a commercial break. Still the film's atmosphere is so goofy that these self-referential stabs at past prime time fixtures are allowable even if the irony in Spheeris' intent doesn't quite gel.

Though the screenwriters refuse to seriously skewer contemporary California's "me" attitude (although highway shootings and pocket cellular phones get adequate ribbing), the rich comic timing of the talented cast provides more than canned laughs.

As Jed, Jim Varney sheds all essence of his vacant Ernest persona and actually brings heart to his role as a caring widower just trying to do right in raising his daughter Ellie May (Erika Eleniak). His vocal mannerisms and appearance uncannily recall Buddy Ebsen's performance in the original series but those half-hour installments could never allow the quiet dignity that Varney brings to the character.

Although Varney brings warmth to the film, make no mistake, this is a madcap comedy and both Diedrich Bader and Cloris Leachman as Jethro and Granny respectively, generate genuine laughter.

Leachman embodies Granny, complete with her backwoods medicine and backyard moonshine, but it is Bader that steals the film. His Jethro is in a word, stupid. He's so stupid that the film teeters on the verge of cheese, but Bader balances this off with a wide-eyed innocence that nudges laughter at his oblivious presence. In one instance, the concept of bowling finds Jethro lost.

The rest of the cast is a series of hits and misses. Lea Thompson hits as a child of the greed decade (the eighties) while "Saturday Night Live"'s Rob Schneider misses as her "I'll Do Anything" beau. As Drysdale, Dabney Coleman hits, bringing sarcasm to subtle depths but Lily Tomlin misses as the ingratiating Miss Hathaway. Tomlin relies too heavily on physical humor and exaggerates every movement. Her performance just isn't funny, but fortunately the talented yet wasted comedienne isn't on screen long enough to do damage.

In the end Hillbillies is a fun cinematic confection whose only crime is striving for laughter. The emphasis is mainly on pratfalls but glimmers of wit do surface, even if the screenplay avoids lambasting the present on anything but a superficial level. Like a visit with old friends, The Beverly Hillbillies sparks nostalgia and inspires some laughs. B-

A rap & rock-filled Judgement

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

Judgement Night
Soundtrack
Epic Soundtrax

It all began back in 1986 or so when rap stars Run DMC teamed up with rock legends Aerosmith to do a remake of "Walk This Way". Rap and rock wouldn't mix blood again until 1990 when Sonic Youth enlisted Public Enemy's Chuck D to help with "Kool Thing."

Public Enemy would later unite with Anthrax in early 1992 to do a killer remake of "Bring the Noyz". It's late 1993, and it's been quite some time since anybody's dared to try it again, but tonight's Judgment Night.

The concept behind the soundtrack to the movie Judgment Night is bold and impressive. Take some of the best alternative rock bands and have them work with some of the best rap acts. What could have been a potential disaster turns into a massive success.

The opening track, "Just Another Victim" by Helmet and House of Pain is a brutal tale of how urban violence and decay ruins people. The first half of the song is grinding guitar and singing by Helmet, the latter half is all House of Pain. All I needed to hear is the line, "Because I read Sun Tzu, I bought a gun so you'll never come too." and I was impressed. Sun Tzu wrote The Art of War.

Teenage Fanclub and De La Soul change to a more chillin' groove with "Fallin'," the story of a washed-up rapper. Both groups sound like they had a really good time in the studio, and it translates into a cool mellow tune to relax too.

The best song on the album has to go to Faith No More and Boo-Yaa T.R.I.B.E. for doing "Another Body Murdered."

Irish rockers hit Northampton

By DAVID GLEESON
Collegian Staff

New York-based Irish rockers Black 47 make an appearence in the valley tonight when they bring their unique musical style to Pearl Street in Northampton to promote their album Fire of Freedom.

Black 47 has a sound that is influenced by traditional Irish music and contains hip-hop/reggae beats with a gritty, New York pub grown "downtown" guitar. Frontman Larry Kirwan adds another level to the band with his vivid, from the heart lyrics.

One of the aspects of the band that captures their audience is their ability to combine their life, the fire of rebellion, a host of diverse musical spirit and humor all in one complete package.

The band has been rocking New York for a number of years after an unreceptive beginning to their career when they were fired from a number of their first gigs. Eventually they settled into Paddy Reilly's, a local Irish Pub that became their stomping ground, and flourished from that point on.

Among other achievments they have received a three and a half star review in Rolling Stone, played across the country, and it has been said they are "unequivocally the best band in New York."

Kirwin, also a playwright, uses his skill to pen songs ranging from political problems here and in Ireland to problems in his life as he tries to survive living in America.

Efforts from the band include the catchy jig "Funky Ceili," which as a video receives regular play on MTV. "Black 47," the song, which like the band's name is representative of the blackest year of the Irish potato famine 1847 and the politically strong, upbeat march "James Connolly."

The band has a special affinity for live performances and a sound with a particularly middle class appeal. Black 47 was definitely created to perform before a live audience.

Doors for the show open at 8 p.m. at Pearl Street, Northampton. Opening act Big Bad Bollocks plays at 8:30, and Black 47 at 9:30. Tickets are $10 in advance at Tix Unlimited in the Campus Center, or $12 at the door.

◆ Judgement

The horrific modern dirge has a complex texture of vocals, piano, guitar and beat that upon listening too is rather disturbing. It's typical Faith No More style of creating something really beautiful, in this case with the piano, and destroying it with haunting effects.

Another highlight is the extremely unlikely combo of Mudhoney and Sir Mix-a-Lot. Who would of ever guessed these two would get together to do a song called "Freakmomma?" Mudhoney lays down a cool riff and complex drumbeat while Mr. Mix-a-Lot goes off in a rather amusing way. Due to subject matter though, you'll have to figure this one out on your own.

Cannabis reform icons Cypress Hill work with both Sonic Youth and Pearl Jam. In "I Love You Mary Jane," just the way Kim Gordon (of Sonic Youth) whispers, "should've come by to get me high" makes it worth listening to. The song is sort of a retro look at the '60s. Pearl Jam (without Eddie Vedder) breaks out of their usual angst-ridden themes, and has some fun with "Real Thing."

Other compilations include Living Colour and Run DMC, Biohazard and Onyx, Slayer and Ice-T, Dinosaur Jr and Del the Funky Homosapien, and Therapy? with Fatal.

The Judgment Night soundtrack is certainly one of the best CDs to come out this year. It's new and interesting, but more importantly, Judgment Night is an intense listening experience that proves once again that rap and rock are flip sides of the same coin. If you like either, check out this CD, it may blow you away. A+

FAC presents Pops Concert

By BETH GOLDSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

The 19th Annual Multiband Pops Concert has something to offer everyone.

"It has such high entertainment value because of the variety of musical styles," said University of Massachusetts Professor of Music and Dance Malcolm W. Rowell.

The concert, which consists entirely of undergraduate and graduate student performers, will feature The Minuteman Marching Band, UMass Marimbas, the Wind Ensemble, the Symphony Band, Jazz Ensemble I, the Chapel, Percussion Ensemble Vocal Jazz & African-American Music Ensemble, and the Varsity Dancers.

It all started 19 years ago with John Jenkins, Professor of Music and Dance and Director of Bands at the time. Jenkins came to UMass as a graduate of the University of Michigan, where there was an old band-a-rama tradition involving a variety of band ensembles playing in a concert.

Jenkins adopted this tradition by organizing a similar concert among the faculty in the Music and Dance Department, and the Multiband Pops Concert was born. He repeated the concert for five years, at which time Rowell became the new organizer and continues the tradition today.

Mullins found to be safe

Controversial report overruled due to second opinion

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN
William D. Mullins Center

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

At a press conference yesterday, overlooking the parque where the Minuteman Basketball Team will soon be holding court, Paul Page, vice-chancellor of Administration and Finance discussed the future of the William D. Mullins Center.

Joined by Lee Eskilsen, executive director of Mullins and Daniel Couco, of Thornton-Tomasetti Engineers, Page said that the sports arena will not close down due to high winds as reported before.

"We are not closing the Mullins Center," Page said. "We feel... the building is safe."

After an announcement from Zallen Engineering, a consulting engineer for the state attorney general's office, questioning Mullins' safety, University of Massachusetts officials contracted Thornton-Tomasetti Engineers to help in evaluating issues raised in the Zallen report.

The report questioned if Mullins could withstand winds of more than 70 miles per hour and moderate earthquakes. Page said he was confident by the conclusions reached by various licensed firms, and insisted the arena was safe.

Couco then answered questions from the press about how his firm reached such different conclusions concerning the safety of the building. He pointed out the fact the firm met with the original constructional engineer before reviewing the Zallen report.

"That is the one key feature that hasn't happened with Zallen," said Couco.

Couco said the fact that Zallen did not have the benefit to meet with the original engineer, they did not get to know the "behavior of the building" which in turn could have led to the assumptions that were made. He indicated that based on his review of the report, Zallen did not take the behavior of the whole building into consideration. Couco explained how the report treated the Mullins Center like a flag pole with an extremely heavy mast at the top, not realizing the roof's weight is distributed evenly throughout the building.

When asked if the firm found nothing wrong because they were hired by the University, Couco responded that the University wanted to know if there were actual problems with the structure and stated the firm is in a review process.

"We are not hired guns. We have a national reputation," said Couco.

He explained also the Zallen Report is focused on the "laterial loads [winds and earthquakes]" not snow loads. But even though the roof is flat, there should not be anything to worry about.

"Buildings have collapsed because blunders have been made. We don't see that here," ouco said.

Esckilsen spoke about patrons' concern of the building confirming there have been phone calls concerning the probe. When asked what will happen if ticket holders want their money back, he said those situations will be handled on an individual basis.

The Mullins Center first came under fire in early February when it was announced the office of State Attorney General L. Scott Harshbarger was investigating the safety of the $51 million structure.

School spirit returns with Homecoming

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

Oct. 22-24 the University of Massachusetts' school spirit will be celebrated. The Alumni staff and the Greek area have come together this year to make Homecoming 1993 a success for the entire UMass community.

"Back To The Future" will be the theme carried throughout the weekend. It is hoped to be seen as a new tradition of Homecoming.

Unlike previous years, Homecoming is going to be aimed at getting the whole campus involved rather then just the sororities, fraternities and alumni.

"Over the next two or three years we are going to try to work on getting the whole university involved with Homecoming. Homecoming isn't for anyone in particular, it's all about the school's spirit and enthusiasm," said Steve Ziolkowski, president of the Inter Fraternity Council.

Ginny Rees, assistant director for on-campus events and administration, said the Alumni office has concentrated on planning events for Homecoming which would also get the students involved.

"We want to work with the student groups, student organizations, Greek areas, RSOs and residence halls, to make Homecoming a university-wide event," said Rees.

Rees said Homecoming is a chance for everyone to show UMass' spirit.

"We really would like to get people to come out for the pep rally and the bonfire on Friday night. Everyone is welcome," said Rees.

Ziolkowski said money is not the problem, it is the lack of student participation.

"We need participation in order to make homecoming successful. We need people to get involved, and get excited; it's our Homecoming!" said Ziolkowski.

The Homecoming pep rally and bonfire will be held on Friday night at 6:30 p.m. on the Campus Pond. This is the first pep rally held in 20 years.

"We are trying to revive some of the old traditions, like the pep rally and bonfire, to really make Homecoming a University tradition so it can be fun for alumni, students and people of the community," said Rees.

Another major event planned for the Homecoming weekend is the Elton John concert. It will be held at the Mullins Center Friday night

Aristide backing lost before return to Haiti

By DAVID BEARD
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — Gunmen reportedly grabbed a legislative ally of Jean Bertrand Aristide, sending another chilling message Thursday to supporters of the U.N. effort to bring the exiled president back to power.

Samuel Milord, a National Assembly deputy whose family said he was dragged from a house late Wednesday, had only recently come out of hiding since denouncing leaders of the bloody coup that ousted Aristide two years ago.

His seizure followed the assassinations of pro-Aristide businessman Antoine Izmery on Sept. 11 and Justice Minister Guy Malary a week ago. Malary was part of the interim government appointed by Aristide, Haiti's first freely elected president, under a U.N. plan for restoring democracy.

Although the army commander Raoul Cedra signed the plan in July, increasing violence and threat by army backed civilian gangs have derailed the timetable for implementing the plan and rebuilding this impoverished nation.

A U.N. embargo on fuel and weapons shipments was reimposed Tuesday to pressure Haiti's military leaders to live up to the accord for returning Aristide to office on Oct. 30.

Lines of cars formed at gas stations in the capital and along the highway to Leogane, 25 miles to the southwest.

Prime Minister Robert Malval's government said he had received a statement from fuel distributors saying they would respect the U.N. sanctions.

The office did not say whether the statement was signed by all three international companies that distribute fuel, Esso, Texaco and Shell.

LSC still powerless

Trustees have yet to restore litigation

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Editors note - This is the last installment of a series examining the Legal Services Center - its past present and potential future.

Throughout the existence of the student Legal Services Office (now Legal Services Center), the issue of representation of students in litigation not involving the University of Massachusetts, which had been the great majority of cases handled, was not a serious concern of the administration or the Board of Trustees. However, in recent years, the trustees have twice refused to allow Legal Services to represent students in such cases.

In the aftermath of the settlement of the Yvette Henry case in 1986, administrators urged the trustees to prohibit LSO litigation against them. When the trustees did in August of that year, student leaders responded by hiring an attorney to challenge this decision in federal court, claiming it was made in retaliation for Henry and other students' exercise of their civil rights.

In August, 1987, after renaming the LSO to the Legal Service Center, the trustees prohibited it from providing any representation in litigation of any kind.

In early 1988, the federal district court dismissed the students' lawsuit. After the students appealed, the First Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in favor of UMass, stating that the University could determine which, if any, legal services it would allow to be paid for out of student fees. This decision let the trustees allow LSC to represent students in litigation that was not against UMass.

However, up to the present time, the trustees have continued to prohibit LSC from representing students in any litigation, as programs at many other universities are allowed to do.

In November, 1989, a major proposal to restore off-campus litigation authority containing extensive documentation concerning unmet legal needs of students and the representation services provided by many other student legal services programs in the U.S. and Canada was submitted. Based upon at 8 p.m.

"This is the first year we tied in a big event to Homecoming, which will hopefully attract more alumni," said Rees.

Many events are also planned for Saturday. The parade is a main event put together by the Greek area and is an annual part of Homecoming. The parade is looked forward to by the the fraternity and sorority alumni, Zialkowski said.

"This year's theme is movies - basically any movie from the past to the current. We have themes such as Jurassic Park, Peter Pan, Wizard of Oz and of course Back To The Future. The Greeks will build their floats around this theme," Zialkowski said.

The marching band, color guard and cheerleaders also will participate in the parade. This year the Greek area asked dorms and living areas to get involved by building floats.

"We tried to come up with active ways to get the whole campus involved with the parade. Opening the parade up to the RSOs was one of the ways. It's a Homecoming parade, not just a Greek parade," said Amy Schulman, president of Panhell House.

The pre-game tailgate party is also an event scheduled for Homecoming on Saturday. This will take place from 11 a.m. - 1 p.m. The tailgate area is outside McGuirk Alumni Stadium, Lot E.

"We have events planned two hours before the game and two hours after the game to make everything that is going on at the stadium a big party," said Rees.

There will be the famous Spoot Gabbling Circus, music and karaoke. The Alumni Association will also have a tent set up for free popcorn.

Another big part of Homecoming weekend is the football game which starts at 1 p.m. During half time the UMass alumni fund members will perform.

"The tailgate party and the football game is what most of the alumni come back for, so we like to make it a special event," Rees said.

The Homecoming weekend is now also becoming a reunion time for many groups to come back to see each other. This year the class of 1968 is celebrating their 25th reunion at Homecoming.

"We want to make this a big event because it is a big deal. Homecoming is the spirit of our school. We want to change it for the future, starting with this year's Homecoming," said Schulman.

Flu shots running low due to popular demand

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

Have you gotten shot yet? If not, you'd better hurry! The flu clinics have almost run out of the flu vaccine, according to a Health Services official.

"We had an overwhelming response to the clinics," said Pam Gonyer, director of health education. "Many more than we expected."

According to Gonyer, University Health Services have administered approximately 1,000 flu shots a day, in the Campus Center, for the last four days. Even though there have been long lines, Gonyer said people have been in and out quickly, with a maximum time of only 15 minutes.

The 6,000 doses of vaccine that the Massachusetts Department of Public Health gave UHS, Gonyer said, have almost run out. She said UHS could only purchase 800 more of the limited vaccines.

"When the vaccines are all gone, the clinics will have to close down," Gonyer said.

UHS said they will have flu clinics in the Campus Center Friday and Monday from 10 a.m. - 2 p.m., and they have set aside enough vaccines to have a clinic at North Village apartments on Tuesday night.

"It's hard to estimate how many vaccines we'll go through," Gonyer said, "but, it's very possible we'll run out of vaccines sometime on Monday."

According to Gonyer, people who are in the "high risk" category should get immunized. This includes people over 65 years-old, people with chronic health conditions, or an immunological disorder and anyone with low resistance to infections.

UHS sources said as soon as all the flu vaccines have been used, all clinics, including those in the dining halls, will be cancelled.

Gonyer said the clinics in Worcester and Hampshire dining commons have been a great success, immunizing approximately 350 people at each one.

"It's been amazing," said Gonyer. "We've had such a positive response that we hate to have it turn into a negative feeling because we're running out of vaccines."

According to UHS sources, last year only 350 people turned out to get vaccinated. This year officials hope they have reached their goal of "herd immunity" to stop a severe flu epidemic.

This year's strain of flu is reportedly more potent than in years past. Because of this, large numbers of students, faculty and classified staff have turned out to be immunized this week.

There is not supposed to be any severe reaction to the shot.

Where's the steering wheel on this thing?

Minuteman debate heats up at noontime rally

Jones announces end to hunger strike

The W.E.B. DuBois Petition Coalition held a rally yesterday on the Student Union steps.

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The Minuteman mascot debate heated up again yesterday when the W.E.B. DuBois Petition Coalition held a rally on the Student Union steps.

Martin Jones, president of the American Freedom Federation and proponent of the petition, announced that he is still hunger striking to try to force Chancellor David K. Scott to open debate on the issues.

Jones announced at a press conference on Monday that he would confine himself to his room, drink only water and have no contact with the press. He was present at a press conference yesterday and told NewsCenter 40 that another person who refused to be named had joined him in his hunger strike. The Associated Press identified Shannon King earlier in the week as being part of the strike.

Jones said he was holding the rally to make their position known and discuss the events leading up to it. "We don't require specifics," Jones said. "We need concrete assurances that debate will happen."

"The governor can speak on the issue of the Minuteman, but he is silent on all issues involving cutbacks," said Charles Lenchner, president of the Radical Student Union.

Jones said the debate was five to 17,000 and he said he believes that if it came to a debate, the mascot would be changed.

"You will lose," Jones said. "You should thank Chancellor Scott for closing debate, because if it came down to it, you will lose."

There were over 70 people at the rally and many of them were yelling insults and openly debating the speakers. Lucas Brunelle, a junior legal studies and finance major, said he disagrees with the protest.

"I think this campus is so diverse. It has so much to offer compared to other schools," Brunelle said. "It bothers me to see people so angry and discontented with everything."

Liberals' confusion discussed

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

A research workshop held in Thompson Hall aimed to discuss the conceptions and misconceptions of the liberals in Central America, before they came into power around 1870.

This was the first of a series of research workshops on Latin America. Entitled "Liberalism before liberal reform in nineteenth century Central America," the workshop was conducted by Lowell Gudmunson, associate Professor of Latin American Studies at Mount Holyoke College.

Gudmunson pointed out how the liberals failed to provide an answer to the Indian struggle at that time. Moreover, he explained how the liberals lacked a strong agenda in the years before the liberal reform.

According to Gudmunson, many alleged liberals became conservative and many conservatives became liberal depending on the government in place at the time. "Patricio Rivas flirtation with William Walker is one sad example" he said; many conservatives benefited from liberal policies like "privatizing land, access to land, export promotion."

Gudmunson attacked the criticism of conservatives by the liberal and Marxist framework saying it "is

BOG holds off on backing LSC

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

The beginning of the Board of Governors meeting was highlighted by two guest speakers from Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

Mirran Raphaely, the issues coordinator for SCERA, and Walidah Willoughby, a volunteer for the task force spoke on behalf of the effort to regain the litigation rights for the Legal Services Center.

Raphaely informed the Board that students pay for Legal Sevices every year in fees from the Student Activities Trust fund to a sum of $150,000 annually but are denied the right for access to an attorney because of a 1983 vote by the University Trustees revoking the litigation rights of Legal Services.

arguments made by William Searson, former general counsel of UMass and long an opponent of LSO/LSC, this proposal was rejected.

In 1991, then vice-chancellor Dennis Madsen supported a student proposal to restore off-campus litigation rights to LSC. Students, staff and administrators worked with a representative of Chancellor Duffey to develop a comprehensive dispute resolution proposal for the Amherst campus, which included LSC's ability to litigate to landlord-tenant and consumer cases only. However, at the executive committee meeting, Searson argued against his own agreement, asserting that not enough time had passed since the removal of litigation authority.

In 1992 and 1993, bills were filed in the state legislature which would authorize LSC to represent students in litigation if students choose to do so, taking the issue out Board of Trustees control.

Currently, the return of litigation rights to LSC in cases not involving UMass has the support of President Michael Hooker, Chancellor David Scott, and Vice Chancellor Thomas Robinson. Students and others who support their legal and civil rights are hopeful that this year will finally see the restoration of litigation rights to Legal Services.

A real UMass midterm

I'm sure you've started your midterms by now, and if you're like me, you're probably looking for a new way to measure your knowledge. You want some sort of report card for mom and dad to show them their money wasn't wasted.

Just because your psychology prof hates you and chemistry meets on Fridays at 8:00 a.m. doesn't mean your stupid. It's not your fault you test poorly, or miss quizzes due to a hangover, or sleep through a boring lecture. There must be some way of proving that you learned something in college, even if it wasn't the periodic table of the elements.

A.J.
STEWART

Whoomp! Here it is. A midterm given to Collegian readers testing general and campus knowledge. Answer all questions that interest you and send in your responses. Guesses, ignorance, and offsides aren't penalized. Good luck. This exam is four-thirds of your semester grade.

1. How many ounces of alcohol does a keg contain?
2. If a 16 inch pizza (round) cost eight dollars, and a 12 inch pizza cost five dollars, which is the better value?
3. Does the universe extend infinitely, and if so, why?
4. How many Minuteman would it take to defeat the Radical Student Union in a mud wrestling Battle Royal?
5. What is Perry Farrell's real hair color?
6. How do single people wash their backs?
7. What does the "33" on the Rolling Rock bottle signify?
8. Who spends longer on hair care, Bill or Hillary?
9. Why does breath stink after six hours of being asleep, but not after 12 hours of being awake?
10. If you consume seven beers in two hours, what is your blood alcohol content? What is the name of the person you end up with?
11. How long until Martin Jones runs to McDonalds for two triple cheeseburgers for three dollars?
12. What is solo synchronized swimming and how can you tell you're good at it?
13. What is the black projectile on the Rand Center: a) a french fry b) a javelin c) a piano key d) a rocket ship
14. Why doesn't Schroeder (Peanut's Beethoven wanna-be) like Lucy?
15. How long until Pearl Jam's new album reaches platinum?
16. What celebrity said, "We should tolerate everything except intolerance," and why does most of this campus agree with this nonsense?
17. Jaye Davidson?
18. Does Chancellor Scott have vertebrae?
19. What is Aquaman's real identity?
20. What should the tower library be named? (Mullin's House of Cards is already taken)
21. Why?
22. Who coined the phrase, "Same as it ever was, same as it ever was, same as it ever was, SAME-AS-IT-EVER-WAS!"
23. Who is more popular, John Calipari or the two what's-their-names who won this university a Nobel Prize?
24. Who had the better nickname: Damian "football" Williams or Reginald "punching bag" Denny?
25. If breast cancer is symbolized by shirts on a clothesline, what is herpes symbolized by?

True or false: This past week, the University decided to debate its formal end?

Comment on this statement: "If I knew where I was going, don't you think I could find a quicker way to get there?"

Bonus essay: How does it feel to be one of the beautiful people?

Send in your answers. All exams will be graded and a reply is guaranteed. Maybe it won't get you off the hook with the parental units, but it might give you something better than attending class to do. Long live procrastination.

Thoughts about campus

Not only is the Minuteman responsible for racial tensions on this campus, I have it on good authority that he was also behind the Mullins Center design.

And did you ever notice how those beady little eyes of his follow you around a room? Don't take my word for it, check it out yourself.

You know, sometimes when I'm at home, I'll be walking through Harvard Square, and some guy will walk up to me and tell me that little green men are controlling our minds and taking over. What do I do? Panic? Cry? Tell him I'll look into the situation? Suggest open debate on the subject? Alert the media?

Got that Chancellor Scott? Smile politely, and walk away.

By the way, Martin Jones, your 15 minutes are just about up. Hope you kept a scrapbook. Oh, and when you finish your hunger strike, the first Big Mac's on me.

In the past few weeks this fine University has been the subject of not one, but two blurbs in Newsweek Magazine. First, there was the controversy surrounding Professor Kerrigan, who is by the way, one of the most enthusiastic and knowledgeable instructors on this campus. Whether that's good news or bad, I don't know.

Second, the good folks at Newsweek publicized Jones, but I dunno...I just always preferred my Wheaties.

Columnist invalidates experience

On Friday, October 15, in Diana D'Avanzo's editorial, she stated, "The psychological complications of abortion are...great." In the majority of cases, this is not true.

In 1989, former Surgeon General C. Everett Koop (who is anti-abortion) reviewed scientific literature pertaining to Post Abortion Syndrome (PAS). This is the syndrome which D'Avanzo cites in her editorial. Koop stated that past-abortion psychological for women were, "miniscule from a public health perspective." Some women experience adverse psychological effects after their abortions the same way "there are people who have a post-death-of-my-mother syndrome, post-lost-my-job syndrome, etc."

In 1990, a group from the American Psychological Association reviewed several U.S. studies for the April 6 issue of Science Magazine. They concluded that "severe negative reactions after abortions are rare."

There are many positive reactions for women who have chosen to have abortion. They feel a sense of control over their lives, increased control over their lives, maturity and relief.

My personal reason for focusing on the psychological effects of abortion a opposed to other issues that D'Avanzo addresses is my own experience with abortion. I had an abortion last year and I am more confident in myself and in my decision making abilities. I feel the experience has effected me positively. Sometimes I think about what my life would have been like if I had had a child. I doubt that my boyfriend and I would be in school, we would be resentful of each other and possibly of the child. We would be unhappy and incredibly burdened. I am still positive I did the right thing.

"Women who suffer from PAS may experience...relationship disorder, repeated abortions and damaged self-esteem." These are D'Avanzo's words. Personally, my relationship with my boyfriend was strengthened during our abortion experience and I have learned lessons in sharing and communication. I am more responsible with birth control and my self-esteem is as strong as it was before the abortion.

The last point D'Avanzo makes about (the fictional) PAS is that it is "characterized by a period of denial." This is ridiculous and is what angers me the most. This is how anti-abortionists can assert the existence of PAS when there is no evidence for it. When I say, "I have had an abortion and I feel only positive psychological effects," then D'Avanzo would simply say, "You are in denial." This invalidates my experience. She is saying that my view as a woman who reports a positive abortion experience are warped and cannot be trusted. This makes her case easier to argue because we are only allowed to listen to women who "admit" their post-abortion problems.

I should be listened to. I had an abortion and I am happy and well-adjusted.

UMass deaf population is a diverse group

I am responding to the article printed in the September 24th Collegian regarding National Deaf Awareness Week. I appreciate your coverage of this important event; however, I feel that deaf people as a whole were not accurately represented in the article. I am profoundly deaf and I communicate by speaking. In the article, however, sign language was described as "the language that the deaf use to communicate."

The deaf population is not a homogeneous body that shares identical cultural and language practices. Some deaf people speak, some sign, and some do both. Based on my experiences, I advocate teaching deaf children to speak from the beginning. It is disturbing to see that most articles and news shows about deafness portray the erroneous information that all deaf people use sign language.

Many people are unaware that it is possible for deaf people to grow up learning how to speak. They are also unaware that if both speaking and signing are used, speech abilities tend not to develop as strongly as if the emphasis was on speaking only. Learning to speak in the absence of hearing is definitely not easy. However, it has been worth it for me. I can carry on effective conversations National Deaf Awareness week would have been an opportune time to educate the public about the entire deaf population.

Comic generalizes

At a time when our campus community is looking to combat oppressive symbols on this campus, it greatly disturbs us that the editors would print the comic strip Steve by M.S. Pacquette [Collegian, Oct. 20]. While some view this as humor, we feel it is representative of the misconceptions of students with disabilities on our campus.

The term Dyslexia is a label encompassing a variety of different learning abilities. The cartoon is unclear as to whether we think or speak backwards, and represents us as less intelligent. This is a situation where one on the outside is making a generalization about a group of people who have been labeled with an already broad and general term.

Graduation ceremony held for EWC counselors

33 women certified to be volunteers

By NICOLE BURKE
Collegian Staff

Last night in a ceremony held in the Campus Center, the Everywoman's Center graduated 33 community women and welcomed them as certified volunteers in the center's Counselor/Advocate and Educator/Advocate program.

Counselor/Advocates are staffed on the hotline, counsel women, and support and accompany women to hospitals, courts or police stations. Educator/Advocates facilitate workshops throughout Hampshire county and teach programs regarding rape and violence against women.

The graduates completed 60 hours of training this semester in workshops that discussed racism, battering and cultural stereotypes. The women were also taught counseling and listening skills.

"We are here to celebrate the achievement of the Everywoman's Center staff members," Jemma Lambert from Highland Valley Elder Services said at the opening of her keynote speech, "because they are tackling the world to make it safer for all of us."

Lambert said the new graduates will be doing work that will deeply affect women and that there is a beginning, a middle, and an end to the training program. Although the graduates were at the end, their work with the program was just beginning.

"We're all really different and we are affected in different ways but there is a shared experience in this work," Lambert said. "We realize that we have an incredible connection with other women."

After the speech award certificates were presented to the graduates. As each graduate joined the circle of staff members they held a purple candle, a tradition at the EWC graduation.

"Each light symbolizes a beacon of light and hope in our community," Sage Freechild, Counselor/Advocate Program Coordinator said, "and the passing of the candle to the graduates symbolizes the expansion of the circle of light and the welcoming and acknowledgement of our new staff."

Kerry Aleman, a junior political science major, was one of the EWC's Counselor/Advocate graduates and will now hold four eight-hour shifts a month, counseling and meeting with women.

"As a counselor we are not there to tell a woman what to do, we are there for her to get her power back because when a woman is abused, she loses her power," Aleman said. "We help women regain their power."

Executives could not be contacted immediately for comment, and it was unclear whether they would defy any order from the army to release fuel.

Parliament has been trying to draft laws to implement provisions of the U.N. democracy plan. Many soldiers and rightists oppose the plan's requirement for the army to give up control of the police and for Cedras to step down.

Two weeks ago, Milord told The Associated Press he was on a "death list" circulated among army allied civilian gangs.

Family members told local radio that gunmen burst into a home in which he was staying in the capital's Debussy section and took him away. Shots were reported in the neighborhood Wednesday night.

An official with Milord's pro Aristide coalition, the National Front for Change and Democracy, confirmed the information. The government was checking into the report.

Milord, a civil engineer, was one of the first lawmakers to publicly denounce the Sept. 30, 1991 coup.

New EWC program supervisor promotes education, awareness

By COLLEEN CRONIN
Collegian Correspondent

Most students believe rapes occur in dark, deserted parking lots, but in reality, 77 percent of rapes at the University of Massachusetts occur in the dormitories, according to Patricia Mata-Guedes of the Everywoman Center in an interview on Monday.

Mata-Guedes is the new supervisor of the Educator/Advocate Program at the Everywoman Center. Her specific role in the program includes supervising volunteers, updating resources and scheduling workshops.

Mata-Guedes, who was born and raised in Rio de Janiero, Brazil, said she feels it is rewarding for her to work at EWC because it is a way for her, as a Latinô woman, to work on issues that affect women of all races and classes throughout the world.

Mata-Guedes believes one major goal of the program at the EWC is to educate people about the myths surrounding violence against women.

"There are many myths about the issue of violence against women and the Educator/Advocate Program works to raise awareness of the facts about issues like rape, battering, sexual harassment and pornography and to dispel any myths about these issues," Mata-Guedes said.

Both the Educator/Advocate Program and the Counselor Advocate Program are comprised of volunteers from UMass and surrounding communities who are trained in 60 hour sessions.

These programs are based on the belief that violence against women is a social justice issue not a moral one. The volunteers who work for these programs focus on empowering survivors instead of re-victimizing them.

The Educator/Advocate program specifically works to teach people about how issues like race and class affect the problem of violence against women. For example one myth is of the black man raping the white woman. Mata-Guedes said the program teaches people the fact that 95 percent of all rapes are interracial.

Mata-Guedes said she believes that every official in a critical position at UMass should take responsibility for these problems. She also said the most important thing for every woman to do is to take an active stand.

"Violence against women is an issue that affects all women on some level," Mata-Guedes said. "Violence against women is everyone's responsibility."

American studies major, said she thinks the mascot should be changed, but feels the debate has gotten out of hand.

Michael Morrissey, a founding member of the University of Massachusetts Alumni and Students to Save the Minuteman, was given a chance to speak at the rally. He said he felt debate should be opened.

He also said he was angry that the protesters were allowed to use the fax machine in the office of the vice-chancellor for student affairs. Morrissey said this showed the administration was taking sides on the issue.

Last night, Jones called the Collegian to announce that the hunger strike had ended. He had come back from dinner at Bertucci's with his mother, Vanin and Scott. Scott said he never ended formal debate, but his statement had been misinterpreted.

Religion affects all parts of life

Inter-religious communication furthers diversity

By BRADLEY DAVIDSON
Collegian Correspondent

Inter-religious communications can help people deal with daily life, according to a symposium held at Smith College last night.

Around 45 students and professors gathered in the Wright Hall Auditorium to partake in a symposium hosted by the Smith College department of religion.

Entitled "Religious Belief and Religious Diversity" the symposium focused on the role that religious belief takes in inter-religious communications. It also dealt with the prejudices it creates and how society manages.

Carol Zaleski a professor of religion at Smith college said inter-religious dialogue plays a major part in societies prejudices.

"We must set up situations where we can have inter-religious discussions open-mindedly and safely," Zaleski said.

Zaleski said that people of exclusive, inclusive and pluralistic ideology must all take a look at there own prejudices before pointing the finger at others. She also said we can all communicate peacefully about our own religions without conforming into one.

"Religions are like a cookbook, we can all be in it yet still have are own individual recipes," Zaleski said.

"The prejudices we have against other religions are very solid and we must try to brake free from them," Rodger Kamenetz, from the Louisiana State department of English said.

He said people need to speak to each other in a more universal non-biased dialogue.

"Although it is difficult we must try to talk to each other not only from our own experiences and personal viewpoint but from a true pluralistic state of mind," Kamenetz said.

He said when people inter-religiously communicate they should try to boost their own beliefs rather than come down negatively on others.

"If we can not enhance our own religious beliefs without giving negative images of other religions then inevitably we will all go down the tubes," Kamenetz said.

When the speakers had finished and the floor was open for discussion no questions were asked.

HOMECOMING 1993

THIS FIRST-RATE MATCHUP WILL PROVIDE GREAT MEMORIES

UMASS VS. DELAWARE

Massachusetts Coach Mike Hodges

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

For the thousands upon thousands of people who have been affiliated with the University of Massachusetts, whether it be alumni, current students or diehard Minuteman fans, Saturday will be a special day.

The alumni will return to the beautiful Amherst campus on the traditionally unique Homecoming Day, joining the students and fellow fans in providing spirit to cheer on the Minutemen football team.

There is a football game?

There sure is. The Minutemen (4-2 overall, 2-2 in Yankee Conference) will host conference foe University of Delaware, who leads the all-time series 16-1, tomorrow afternoon at 1 p.m. at McGuirk Stadium. The Fighting Blue Hens are nationally ranked at No. 7 and 5-1 (3-1 in the YanCon) on the season.

"It definitely adds to the game," said sophomore quarterback Andrew McNeilly in reference to it being the Homecoming game. "A lot of the older guys are around. The alumni, the parents — it definitely adds something."

"For most players, yeah, Homecoming game brings you up in front of your crowd," said sophomore Rene Ingoglia. "But the biggest thing is it's Delaware. There's not much more you can say. Our record against them speaks for itself."

The Minutemen are currently riding a three-game winning streak, including an exciting 20-17 victory at UConn last week. They are also unbeaten at McGuirk this season, and have averaged over 35 points a game in those three games.

The Minuteman offense has been solid the last three weeks as the strong ground game has been utilized. Ingoglia leads the Yankee Conference with 810 yards (135.0 yards per game) and has gone over the 100-yard mark four times this season.

Ingoglia also leads the team with eight touchdowns. Senior John Johnson, who ran for 118 yards last weekend against UConn, will share the tailback duties with Frank Alessio, the redshirt freshman who sat out last week's game due to a broken hand.

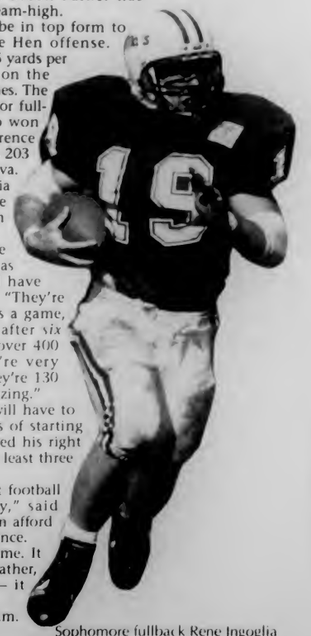
In last weekend's game against UConn, the Minutemen ran the ball 69 times, and McNeilly threw just nine passes (6 of 9, 63 yards). Coach Mike Hodges did not expect the ground game to garner 360 yards on just 69 carries. Hodges anticipated that the Minutemen would mix it up against the Huskies. Not so.

"I went into (the UConn game) wanting to and planned on throwing the football, producing a more balanced attack," said Hodges. "We were gaining five yards a carry while running the football. If we can do that this week, we'll do it again. However, we don't anticipate being able to do that this week."

The Minuteman defense is among the best in the Yankee Conference. The Minutemen have sacked the opposing quarterback 35 times this season for losses of 217 yards, a league-high. Junior defensive end Brian Corcoran leads the team with eight. Two senior All-American candidates, free safety Matt Rajotte and linebacker Mario Perry, lead the Minutemen in tackles with 55 and 52 respectively.

Sophomore cornerback Breon Parker has picked off five passes, a team-high.

The Minutemen must be in top form to stop the explosive Blue Hen offense. Delaware has gained 533.5 yards per game, with 352.7 yards on the ground, in its first six games. The Blue Hens are led by junior fullback Darryl Brown, who won last week's Yankee Conference Player of the Week for his 203 yard effort against Villanova. Brown is second to Ingoglia in the Yankee Conference with 765 yards rushing on 125 carries.



"From an offensive standpoint, (Delaware) is as fine a football team as I have ever seen," Hodges said. "They're averaging over 500 yards a game, over 40 points a game after six games. We're averaging over 400 yards a game, and we're very happy with that; and they're 130 yards ahead of us. It's amazing."

The Blue Hen offense will have to play without the services of starting QB Dale Fry, who fractured his right clavicle and will be out at least three to four weeks.

"We have two excellent football teams playing Saturday," said Hodges. "Neither of us can afford another loss in the conference.

"It should be a great game. It is supposed to be nice weather, it's Homecoming Day — it really should be fun."

The game begins at 1 p.m. at Alumni Stadium.

wrong to look at conservatism as incapable of attaining certain goals."

However, he mentioned how the liberals, once in power in 1870, were committed to land privatization unlike in the previous years; but "they were seen more like thieves than social revolutionaries." He gave the example of land privatization in Costa Rica where the coffee oligarchy took over the public lands that were best suited for coffee production.

When asked by Carmen Diana Deere, professor of economics at UMass, about trade policy, he said that there was no trade policy debate in a Central American level, "each country was to his own," said Deere.

Gudmunson said the importance of the construction of the Panama railroad in 1855 since it altered the credit channels in the region. He also pointed out the misconception that the conservatives were against trade since they "took pride into the their export promotion policies."

Gudmunson called the import taxation at that time regressive. "The use of those funds varied enormously - from strengthening the military to the funding of education," he said.

After the presentation, the question of equal access to the economy was raised by some of the participants. Gudmunson answered that "technically there was equality, but equality within the hierarchy. In practice each family pursued the privatization of common lands."

He was also asked about the relationship between the situation at that time and the present issues of peasant mobilization to the rain forest. "I see a clear parallel in many levels...as losers emerge there is expulsion of labor from the common lands," said Gudmunson.

At the end of the event, Professor Deere, chair of the Latin American Studies Workshop series, urged people to participate more actively in the program of events that they have prepared this semester for the community.

Legal Services is permitted to advise students, give recommendations for attorneys outside LCS, and to provide internships for students due to the 1983 motion.

"It's like having bought the car, but not being given the key," said Willoughby.

Raphaely asked the board to verbally endorse the movement to regain the litigation rights of Legal Services.

The Board opted to formally vote on the matter next week due to concerns expressed by many governors on not having the bill available for review before a vote and for not having the opinions of their constituents.

The bill will be available for all governors and students in the Board of Governors office in the campus center.

"There is a strong sentiment of the board to support the joins efforts of SGA and SCERA to bring back the litigation rights. We are investigating the best ways for the Board of Governors to help in the fight," said the Board in a statement to the Collegian.

During governors comments an overwhelming majority expressed a dire need to support the Legal Services Center and for all students to get involved.

"I am hopeful that the board will pass a motion endorsing this effort and I encourage every student to stop by and pick up a copy of the bill," said Chairman George Fitzgerald.

The past weeks events were reported during the rest of the meeting. The Adhoc committee met to allocate more office space for the Graduate Student Senate, and the Board also expressed interest in helping the Commuter Area Government organization to get new furniture and to have more accessible office space.

Ali Davis, a sophomore economics major, was read into the minutes as the new governor-at-large.

Mariah Carey to play Mullins next week

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Mariah Carey, songstress extraordinaire, will be appearing at the Mullins Center on an unannounced night next week.

Lee Esckilsen, executive director of the Mullins Center, confirmed Carey's performance yesterday but would not confirm a specific date. Representatives of Columbia Records will not confirm this information, and say only that her first-ever tour will cover six states, including a stop in Worcester on Nov. 9.

The Mullins Center has, however, issued a press release stating that a sold-out lecture by Tom Peters has been moved from the Mullins Center to the Fine Arts Center, due to a scheduling conflict.

Eskilson asserts that although the relocation of the lecture is relevant to Carey's performance, it does not confirm that the concert will be held Thursday night.

Carey is touring to promote her latest album, Music Box, featuring the hit "Dream Lover."

Carey's first album, entitled Mariah Carey, initiated her trip to stardom in 1990 with popular tracks like "Vision of Love" and "I Don't Want to Cry."

Emotions is Carey's second effort, a 1991 album which further enhanced the pop-star's career with songs like the title track, "Can't Let Go" and "Make it Happen."

Carey's third album, the EP Unplugged, made history in 1992 by making her the first performing artist to have success in marketing accoustic tunes, and making it appealing to a large audience.

The disc's big single, a rendition of the Jackson Five's "I'll Be There," blared from virtually every radio station and brought Carey enormous success. Since then, the unplugged trend has exploded, inspiring such artists as Arrested Development, Eric Clapton, Pearl Jam and Rod Stewart.

Carey's performance will be one of the biggest to come to Mullins, as the well-know pop personality and peformer will bring with her the jamming rhythms that we can all undoubtedly groove to.

Stay tuned for updates as this musical mystery unfolds.

Vs.
Pearl Jam
Epic

Eddie Vedder is chased by Shannen Doherty. Eddie totes wine bottle at MTV Video Awards. Eddie climbs girders of local arena. Eddie eats sheet music and farts music. Eddie attends UMass rally to save the Minuteman. Eddie ... enough about Eddie.

We all know it's here. We've seen Eddie's curls on the covers of the Boston Phoenix, Rolling Stone, Musician and Time Magazines. Strawberries, Tower Records and Newbury Comics all had midnight record release parties, some offering T-shirts and even Pearl Jam tattoos to entice. You can hear it blasting down the hall or next door. It's here, and it rocks!

The new release, first untitled, then called Five Against One (of which some tapes still have as a title), is now called Vs. and is truly a joint effort of the five band members. This is the most touted second release from a new band since Boston (who?). However this one breaks the pressure and anxiety (and critics) by producing a classic.

The new album is the culmination of a year and a half away from the studio, playing gigs all over the world with performers like U2, Neil Young and the Chilis and their dealing with newly found superstardom. In an interview with Pearl Jam when they played UMass, their expectations of Ten were small. Eddie thought they'd sell 75,000 albums. Bassist Jeff Ament was the most daring with a prediction of 150,000 albums. Humble. The question posed to them - will they sell out?

Vs. answers all questions, satisfies all critics and rocks the world of every grunge-type, music lover and alternative wannabe. Their sound is held together by Jeff Ament on bass and Dave Abbruzzese on drums, a chunky funk sound that stands way above their first release, Ten. Abbruzzese was recruited just after the release after Dave Krusen left for personal reasons, and brings a fresher sound to the band. The rhythms of Stone Gossard set the steady soul of the songs while Lightnin' Mike McCready rips it up on lead.

The album starts off with their first single release, "go" with riveting guitar work and a heavy quick sound reminiscent of "Porch." With songs like "go," "animal" (which some may have seen premiered at the MTV Video Awards ceremony) and "blood," Pearl Jam catches the fire they ended Ten with. No sell out.

Eddie's lyrics remain socially aware as the first was, writing about disturbing human nature in the song "rats" and about the horrible incident in Detroit where Detroit police beat black motorist Malice Green to death with flashlights. The song is called "w.m.a.," and it dispels the notion of men being beyond the law. "White Male American/ Do no wrong," the song goes. The song "glorified g," a song people either love or hate, blasts the widespread use of guns in America. "Got a gun/ Fact I got two/ That's o.k. man cause I love God."

This album is not grunge. There is a very limited amount of feedback and offbeat rhythms and solos,

Over 400 line up at early morning album release

By PHILIP LEVASSEUR
Collegian Correspondent

At midnight on Oct. 18, a crowd of over 400 die-hard Pearl Jam fans lined up at Strawberries in the Stop & Shop plaza on Rte. 9 to buy the band's latest release, Vs. Strawberries opened it's doors at 12:01 a.m. with only 150 copies of the CD to sell.

By 12:35 a.m. there were only 30 copies of the CD left to sell, as people began to hand money to friends in the front of the line to buy them a copy before they were sold out.

"In the past, these midnight releases were smaller and didn't sell out. This has been the biggest turnout ever," said Laurie Vadeboncoeur, manager of Strawberries. The CDs were being sold at a special price of $11.89, while the tape was priced at $7.99.

With a large crowd still lined back as far as the Stop & Shop, a car decided to entertain the crowd by screeching its tires as it drove past. Responding along with the cheering crowd was the Amherst police who immediately pulled the car over while the crowd cheered even louder.

At 12:55 a.m. Vadeboncoeur addressed the crowd and announced that only six CDs were left. She apologized for not having more in stock saying, "Our company thinks we're a tiny little store in the middle of the woods." For many in the line it was a CD or nothing, and much of the crowd dissipated.

"On a whim I decided to come by and pick it up. I've already got it on vinyl," said Eric Roberts, a senior literature major at UMass.

Nancy C., a freshman at UMass, was one of the lucky ones to get a copy of the CD.

"I'm really really happy and really really glad the release was put out on time. Eddie Vedder is God," she said.

The CD is appropriately fashioned in Halloween colors. The CD itself is orange, while the inside fold out contains two photos in black and orange. The lyrics printed in the inside are true to the pitcher-scribble form found on the band's enormously popular recording Ten. While the CD has no name on it, and is referred to as versus, the tape is titled Five Against One.

While Pearl Jam was the main attraction, other artists who were releasing new recordings as of Tuesday were also being sold, with the second biggest seller being the new release by Rush.

Miller's dark Crucible examines conscience

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

When The Crucible first opened in 1953, its examination of hypocrisy and power abuse in the Salem Witch Trials was largely perceived as an allegory for McCarthyism and the blacklisting of the day. But historical distance from the "red scare" has opened the play to countless new interpretations. A flurry of revivals over the past decade (including productions at the Long Wharf and The National Actors Theatre) have reawakened public interest in the play, and led it to eclipse Death of a Salesman as the most produced work in Arthur Miller's repertoire.

"I was drawn to write The Crucible not merely as a response to McCarthyism," Miller explained in an interview with the New York Times. "[The play] is examining the questions I was absorbed with before — the conflict between man's deeds and his conception of himself; the question of whether conscience is in fact an organic part of the human being, and what happens when it is handed over not merely to the state or the mores of the time, but to one's friend or wife."

This is the question faced by John Proctor, who finds his wife accused of witchcraft by his spurned former mistress. Caught up in a wild public hunt, Proctor is under enormous pressure to abandon his wife and faces the threat of physical pain if he discredits the accuser, by confessing his infidelity to the Puritanical court.

The play also examines the manner in which the Puritan jurists create the witch scare, and fuel the ensuing madness — using grudges and suspicion to engender groundless, unanswerable charges.

"[Miller] was trying to go for a more universal message about abuse of power," explains Sam Rush, director of the current Smith College production. It is this phenomenon of manipulation through strength which Rush hopes to examine. Though the modern world is full of abuses similar to those about which Miller writes, Rush's direction and M.E. Kane's sets and costumes are not designed to reflect any specific controversies.

Rush said he feels that the ideas of the show are strong enough to support themselves without the intrusion of new political contexts. It is, he says, "a very, very well-constructed show."

Remaining performances of the Crucible are Oct. 22-23 and 27-30, 8:00 p.m. at Smith's Theatre 14. Phone (413) 585-3220 for more details.

New exhibit showcases multiracial family art

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

The A.P.E. Gallery in Thorne's Marketplace, Northampton, is currently filled with wonderful photographs - photographs of families: parents, children, family pets. They are part of the exhibit "Portraits of Multiracial Families", featuring the work of Peggy Gillespie and Gigi Kaeser, which opened Sunday, Oct. 17.

On opening day the A.P.E. Gallery was filled with enthusiastic people as well as boisterous children. Gillespie and Kaeser captured in their work families representing towns all over the Pioneer Valley, from Turners Falls to Northampton to Amherst.

People featured came from all different career paths, from psychotherapists to retail managers. Children photographed were all ages. They all shared one thing, however - all the families are comprised of differing racial identities.

Under each of the photos was a statement from each of the family members, relating their experiences in a multiracial family. Many related stories of difficulties they experienced due to society's lack of acceptance. Some of the children having been adopted. Some of the parents being homosexual.

Most of the families related stories of their own experiences with racism as well as their thoughts about race issues, racism and the meaning and importance of multiracial families.

"Nobody decides to be racist," said Jose Abad, 12. "People are taught to be racists."

More than just having multiracial identities in common, all of the families photographs in the A.P.E. Gallery share another aspect - they capture and convey the love shared by these family members. Children are embraced by parents, ride bikes together and are captured in stunning off-guard moments.

"Portraits of Multiracial Families" will run until November 2 at the A.P.E. Gallery in Thorne's Marketplace. It will then travel onto the Amherst public schools.

■ Pearl Jam

but this album ascends grunge and classic Zep rock with the noticeable funk style of the battery. Dave and Jeff. The songs "rats," "blood" and "w.m.a." all have the alternating drums and thick bass riffs behind the quick metal sounding guitar of McCready. It is a Pearl Jam sound and no other, the way Jane's Addiction pioneered their sound.

For most of Vs., the lyrics simply enhance the songs' beauty, but there are some standouts. The song "daughter" will be a hit within the next six months. I've already heard people chanting "Don't call me daughter/ Not fit to/ picture kept will remind me." The other is a ballad called "elderly woman behind the counter in a small town." It's a beautiful ballad about love's anguish, a theme Eddie knows too well.

The last song on the album is very similar to the last song on Ten, "Release." Its organ background gives a soothing feel like "Release," while Eddie's voice slowly plays against the keys in a somber, down but not out kind of voice. "How much difference does it make," he repeatedly asks. Then there's "rearviewmirror," the best song on Vs.

Don't look for any videos too soon. Pearl Jam stopped doing interviews and videos a long time ago to keep the music fresh. They don't want to flood the market, they just want to play their music. No sell out. A-

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A new business benefits from the advice of experts. Your business and romantic partner could be one and the same. Do not hold on to the past. Come out with something fresh.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Act on an original idea as soon as possible. Unexpected financial outlays could arise at the last minute. Improve your research techniques. A new romance makes a former love take notice.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Taking a new, more philosophical approach to a problem helps you reach an important decision. Try to remain levelheaded when pressured at work.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Everything seems to be going smoothly now. Aren't you glad you took the time to straighten out your business affairs? Your co-workers admire your plucky spirit.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Aligning yourself with important players now could mean a financial or career goal within reach. A group function stirs pleasant memories or creative ideas. Seek new ways to develop untapped talent.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Things could go awry if you are too set in your thinking. Teaming up with an innovator put you on the right track. Join groups or pick up a hobby that allow you to show your creative side.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A dream vacation or home leads to romance. Obtaining financial backing from another person may depend on how much you believe in yourself. Keep your expectations after meeting with a VIP.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Those efforts a needed change is paying off. Making decisions is easier than you'd fantasized. A member of the opposite sex could be to complete your list. Protect your right.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Avoiding gossipy people and secret dealings keeps you from getting caught in the undertow at work. Jolly people could energize and find a way to reward you. Reschedule a postponed holiday.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A prominent person shows interest in your talents and career. Keep a keen grip on your emotions and pay careful attention to what you are told. Watch out for arguments with your partner.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Diplomacy helps you reduce conflicts at work. A new project provides a wonderful outlet for your creative talents. Turn your work space inside out. Clear away the clutter.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Discord could arise over a domestic chore or the like of a project. Be calm, determined, your optimism and boundless mental muscle are the right mixture.

Volleyball wins again, to face Lady Colonials

By CANDICE FLEMMING
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Women's Volleyball team beat the Lady Stags of Fairfield on Tuesday in straight games but Coach Bonnie Kenny said she still wasn't happy with her team's performance.

"I'm not very pleased with the way we played at all," said Kenny. "We need to be playing much better this time of year and we're not. We just don't play hard enough and we need to learn how to do that."

In the first game UMass jumped out to a 7-2 lead highlighted by two kills by Dionne Nash and a solo block by Rachel Sky-Stiskin. After a timeout the Lady Stags managed to pull within one by scoring six out of the next eight points. That would be as close as they would get as the Minutewomen closed out the game with Susan Maga collecting a block and a kill to lead UMass to a 15-11 win.

In game two the Lady Stags jumped out to a 6-3 lead before the Minutewomen came back to tie it and take a 7-6 lead behind the serve of Beth Cabral. UMass increased that lead to 8-6 on a block by Nash. However, momentum shifted to Fairfield and they took a commanding 12-9 lead and looked to be in control of the game. But behind the strong serving of Cass Anderson and Sky-Stiskin, UMass scored the next six points to win the game 15-12.

In Game three the Minutewomen jumped out to a 7-1 lead led by a couple of Kim Mizner kills. But once again Fairfield fought back scoring five out of the next six points to pull within two, 8-6. Led by a Maga ace, UMass took another seemingly commanding lead 12-6, before the Lady Stags rang off six unanswered points to tie it up and make it interesting. The Minutewomen then closed out the match on a Nash kill to win 15-13.

"We've played better games," said Nash. "We should've never played that long. All the games should have been over really quick."

Four UMass players had double figures in kills with Maga and Mizner leading the way. Maga had 14 kills and a team high 17 digs while Mizner collected 17 kills and 14 digs, hitting for a .333 percentage.

"We played at a very low level tonight," said Kenny. "It's really disappointing that we can't take advantage of playing a team and really beat them."

needed.

"We have a good nucleus at defense, and those guys will save us when we slip up. They'll compensate for our mistakes," he said.

"I only had about 10 or 15 shots come at me against Penn State, so I know they all did a great job," said starting goalie Dave Kilduff. "They've made great strides since the first day of practice."

Speaking of goalies, the rotation appears to be set. Mallen will go with three, and Kilduff is the firm starter. He played 70-odd games in British Columbia for the Merritt Centennials last year, and said he's raring to go.

"I'm not nervous now, but I probably will be as the game draws nearer," he said. "I'm anxious because we've been here and practicing for almost two months, and I'm ready to play.

"I hate to admit it, but all the dryland conditioning we've done is gonna help us, as will the fact we play in a huge rink. We're just gonna go with the flow."

History won't be rewritten Saturday night, but it will be expanded, and the new wave of UMass hockey players are ready to get it on.

"I guess you don't really think about being a part of history when you're playing," Bonneau said two weeks ago. "It's different. We're just looking to get the season going."

Intramurals on ice

Mallen-less teams still popular

By JORMA KANSANEN
Collegian Staff

With the dawn of the new age of University of Massachusetts hockey this weekend, focus has been put on how Coach Joe Mallen and the boys are going to fare in their inaugural season. What's been kind of lost in the shuffle is this University's traditional form of on-ice mayhem, intramural hockey.

In the collegiate and professional ranks, dedication, concentration and especially physical stamina are the foundations to achieving individual and team success. These same principles apply in intramurals, but to a lesser, and more personal extent.

"You get a good workout," explained Kyle Staplin of the team Blood, Sweat and Beers. "And you get a chance to play with some great guys."

"It takes a lot of stamina," Brian Lopez said. "After the first night I was dying."

Popularity for intramural hockey has never really waned since its inception in the 1970s. But with the publicity and excitement of the new UMass Minutemen squad, enrollment has reached a new level.

"It's getting real big," Lopez said. "When I tried getting a team in by the deadline...the spots were already full."

Recently in the National Hockey League, a series of disturbing incidents have occurred concerning the brutal violence factor. For example, the knightly joust between Bob Rouse and Bob Probert in the Maple Leaf Gardens. Question is, does this happen in intramurals?

"The officials do a really good job," Staplin said. "Everybody just looks to play some hockey...it could easily get out of hand."

In early league action, a couple of teams have jumped out to good starts. Blades of Steel and the Mother Puckers have come out of the gates undefeated, while the Wolverines (2-1) are close behind impressively with 19 goals in their first three games. A dark horse pick for the league title has emerged in the team Cameltoes, looking good offensively in a victory against Blood, Sweat and Beers (1-2).

Women's X-C ready for possible A-10 repeat

By JONATHAN GANGI
Collegian Staff

While the women's soccer and field hockey teams are making all sorts of headlines this fall, there is another squad quietly putting themselves in a position for national acclaim here at the University of Massachusetts.

The women's cross country team goes into the Atlantic 10 Championships tomorrow with a chance to claim the conference title for the second straight year, as well as a chance to make the Nationals.

Although the Paul Short Invitational held on Oct. 9 turned out to be a disappointment, it may have lit a fire beneath the Minutewomen, giving them a motivational boost for the biggest meet of the season thus far. The Minutewomen have had two weeks to prepare, and it seems they have made the best of it.

"They worked their butts off," said Coach Julie LaFreniere.

The women are currently ranked third in the A-10, behind St. Joseph's and Rhode Island. However, prior to the let down two weeks ago, they were No. 1, and they have defeated both St. Joe's and URI this season. In fact, they beat URI twice in two confrontations.

"We should really be ranked second," LaFreniere said.

The two weeks off may have been helpful in more ways than one. Senior co-captain Kelly Liljeblad has had an injury plagued season. After being the team's top runner last year, she has been unable to equal her contributions this fall. LaFreniere said she thinks the rest could do Liljeblad a lot of good and hopes to see a strong performance from the team leader.

Despite suffering from an iron deficiency, junior transfer Kristin Diggs finished second for her squad in only her second meet as a Minutewoman. LaFreniere said that she is looking much better this week and it should be interesting to see what she can do in full health.

In her first four collegiate meets, freshman Melissa Langevin has been the first UMass runner to cross the line, and has taken home four A-10 Freshman of the Week awards. She is the unquestionable favorite to run away the A-10 Freshman of the Year honor, which is determined, simply, by who finishes first at the Championships.

Junior Julie Moreau finished third for the women last meet in what LaFreniere termed "one of the best meets of her life."

If Langevin maintains her pace, Liljeblad and Diggs run without pain and Moreau continues her efforts, the rest of the A-10 will have plenty of trouble keeping the Minutewomen from reclaiming their crown.

sible glory he would receive on this page in this space.

"So this is the voice behind Pigskin Picks. I've wanted at you for weeks now," Snoonian said.

Ya know, Jeff, I'm sure there are a lot of people who can sympathize with you; but like I always say, I'm a hard guy to understand, so take the Picks for what they are. By the way, I am listed in the phone book. I'm an easy man to find.

I talked about the variety of fans earlier, and Adam Lynn was surely stereotypical; anyone remember my editorial on freshmen? Enough said.

Lynn claimed he was related to WWF superstar The Undertaker and said that it was unfair to say that his relative was a cold individual.

"Everyone thinks he's coldhearted; deep down, he's got the heart of a lion," Lynn said. "I think the Undertaker deserves his own column on the Collegian sports page."

O.K., have him come down to the Basement and give it a try. Notes from the Underground sounds kind of catchy.

Best sign all night read: The Undertaker is a Necrophilliac. I know anyone who cared about the results of the card was there in attendence. However, to please my old roommate, here are the results that matter:

Lex "The Original Minuteman . . . I mean All-American" Luger beat Borga by using the metal plate in his forearm, Yokozuna squashed the 'Taker after Mr. Fuji hit Paul Bearer with the Japanese flag and ran off with the urn and "The Bad Guy" Razor Ramon collected a victory over I.R.S.

On to the pigskin:

We'll keep it short and sweet this week, starting with a big Monday night football showdown in intramural football. I hear Half in the Bag, anchored by Brian Garber "Baby Food," Dave "Top Gun" Veratti, and H.D. "Special Delivery" Shariati has a shot at the championship. But first they must defeat Beer Necessities. They can talk a good game, can they walk that aisle? I know you don't care, so here's my prediction. Half in the Bag 14, Beer Necessities 13.

In case you didn't know, tomorrow is the Homecoming Game against Delaware. Bob Marcum put up a sign in the UMass locker room earlier this season that reads "Play Like Champions Today." With the balanced rushing attack of Ingoglia, Johnson and Alessio, the Minutemen don't need Andrew McNeilly to pass a lot and they should benefit. Look for Mario Perry to dominate, and Coach Hodges' boys to play like champions tomorrow. Massachusetts 17, Delaware 13.

NCAAs but this game will likely decide who will host the regional, and as No. 1 seed, the winner will have an easy road to the Final Four.

"This will be a great game," Rudy said. "The only thing we need is a big crowd to come out to the game. A loud and wild crowd can make all the difference."

The key to this one will be the ability of UConn to control the middle of the field. The Huskies do not score a lot of goals (but 33 is not bad) and they will need to stop the Minutewomen attack which, when on, is deadly.

UConn is Balanced up front, with nine players scoring two or more goals on the season. In net, sophomore Amy Schwarz, who started 20 games last season and the first nine games of this season, was replaced by junior Jill Gellenbien.

Hockey returns from 15-year hiatus

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts hockey program begins its road back tomorrow night with the season opener at Merrimack.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The time has finally come for the University of Massachusetts hockey team. Saturday night at 7 p.m. is when the team officially makes its return from a 15-year layoff to face Merrimack College (1-0) in Andover.

After three years of constructing a rink, two years of planning the team, six months of recruiting, two months of conditioning, three weeks of practice and one exhibition game, the Minutemen are ready. They better be.

"The biggest thing we'll have to face is the tempo," first-line center Blair Manning said. "They run a high tempo, and we're coming out of prep school so we may be in for a shock."

The UMass squad is comprised almost entirely of New England players coming from prep school programs and Canadians coming from junior hockey. The team is nearly 100 percent freshman, and nobody has collegiate experience.

Coach Joe Mallen said his first line would be Blair Manning (from Alberta) at center, Springfield's Rob Bonneau at right wing and Blair Wagar, a former junior player from Saskatchewan, at left wing.

Mallen said he feels comfortable with his forwards, and would not hesitate to give three or four lines substantial ice time.

"I'll tell you right now, we're real close to having three solid lines," he said. "They can all play, and they'll all see plenty of action."

Other forwards include Tom Perry and Mike Evans, both of whom scored impressive goals in the exhibition win against Penn State.

"I think we have some real solid lines," Manning said. "Coach will do what he has to do, but I think we'll all see a good amount of time."

Warren Norris, a former Canadian junior player, is still having problems with getting his aptitude tests sent to UMass, a lingering problem of last week's SAT fiasco.

"He's still got a problem because of the different requirements in Newfoundland," said Mallen. "But other than that, the SAT episode is finished."

The episode involved The College Board in Princeton, New Jersey having problems sending certain players' scores to UMass. The problem kept a number of players, including backup goaltender Rich Moriarty, on the sidelines last week.

Barnstable's Rich Alger, Jaynen Rissling from Edmonton and Connecticut's Dale Hooper make up a defense which is big and tough, if inexperienced. Mallen said he was also impressed with the way Armand Latulippe has come on.

Manning said he is confident the defense will pick up the slack when Mother Nature suspends Minutewoman game

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — University of Massachusetts field hockey Head Coach Pam Hixon will have to wait at least until Saturday to register win number 250, as a downpour cut short the matchup between No. 3 UMass and No. 13 Boston University.

The game started on time with intermittent showers causing most of the crowd to take shelter at BU's Nickerson Field.

The Terriers scored early as senior forward Margaret Walsh caught Hilary Rose out of the net to give BU a 1-0 advantage. The goal served as a wake-up call for the Minutewomen who couldn't adjust t the wet turf. They stormed back and took control of the game.

"That was a world class goal," said Hixon. "We weren't ready for the pace of the game, but we came back within five minutes and got the equalizer and that is so important and it showed the character of this team."

"After the goal was scored we snapped out of our little slump and started playing really well," said junior forward Danielle Borges.

UMass received a scare when senior mid-fielder Holly Hockenbrock went down after being hit in the knee by a Terrier shot.

Hockenbrock not only returned to action, but with 27:42 left in the first half she took a pass from Natalie Hart off of a penalty corner to knot the score at one.

The Minutewomen kept the pressure on as forwards Tara Jelley, Jenn Salisbury and Borges were impressive up front for UMass, but a talented BU defense kept turning them back.

The rain picked up in the second half and with 26:24 remaining, a lightning bolt lit up the Boston sky, causing the officials to delay and eventually postpone the game.

"I think we were playing extremely well. We had a great strategy against them, and it was working really well," Hixon said. "We really controlled the game. In one respect I'm disappointed that we couldn't finish, but in the other respect neither team wants to risk injury at this point in time."

"We're all very disappointed. We wanted to finish it up," said Hockenbrock. "We were playing really well, we stuck to the game plan we developed and it was working really well."

If a time can be found that fits into both teams' schedules, they will restart the game from the point of the delay.

The Minutewomen return to action this weekend against the Huskies of Connecticut, when Hixon will get another shot at win No. 250.

Wrestling the pigskin away from the NFL

Art Stapleton's PIGSKIN w/ PICKS

Before I even think of talking about the NFL, the topic of the week is the World Wrestling Federation, and after last night's card of matches, one question lingers in my mind:

How many toolboxes were actually sober in the Mullins Center last night? Well, if I count myself, there is at least a guarantee of . . . one.

There were a host of interesting characters at ringside. You had your Bret "The Hitman" Hart imitators, the "Rowdy" Roddy Piper fan club members, and even Finnish flags in support of Ludvig "Don't call me Victor" Borga.

And when I took a walk around Mullins, I met up with more than I ever expected.

The fan of the night was definitely Stockbridge Senior Jeff Snoonian, who seemed to be enjoying every minute of the madness and absolute WWF mayhem.

"Wrestling is such a spectacle," said Snoonian. "It is something everyone should experience once."

Snoonian, who is an avid [hold the laughter] Tampa Bay Bucs fan, seemed to revel in the pos-

Women's soccer duels at noon

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Just about everything a soccer fan could want will be supplied in tomorrow's (noon) Massachusetts-Connecticut women's soccer game.

You want two quality teams?

Connecticut is 13-3-1, the Big East Champion, ranked No. 1 in the North and No. 5 in the nation. Massachusetts is 11-2-3, the Atlantic 10 regular season champ, ranked No. 2 in the North and eighth nationally.

You want tradition?

These two programs have ruled women's soccer in the North. UConn has appeared in all 12 NCAA Tournaments, UMass in 11 of 12.

Rivalry?

Two seasons ago, UConn knocked the Minutewomen out of the NCAAs with a 1-0 victory in Storrs, Conn. Last season, UMass gained revenge when Rachel LeDuc knocked home the overtime winner, giving the Minutewomen a 2-1 decision.

UMass leads the all time series 11-9-3.

You want players?

Try UConn's All-American midfielder Karen Ferguson or frontrunner Tracy Guilford (seven goals). On the other side of the field you have UMass goalkeeper Briana Scurry and defenders Paula Wilkins and Heidi Kocher. Up front the Minutewomen have Nicole Roberts (nine goals) and LeDuc (seven scores).

You want coaches?

UConn's Len Tsantaris has 202 career women's collegiate victories, while UMass' Jim Rudy has 151 wins, not counting his 13 seasons coaching men at the University of Central Florida.

Playoff implications?

Both teams are in good shape to return to the Football rushes over No. 7 Delaware

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts rushed for a school record 476 yards and stuffed the run on the defensive end as they trounced No. 7 Delaware, 43-29, at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium for Homecoming last Saturday.

The Minutemen (5-2) never trailed against the favored Blue Hens (5-2), and three consecutive TDs in the third quarter put the game out of reach. The defense held touted running back Daryl Brown to 52 yards on 11 carries and gave Delaware only 116 total yards on the ground.

The win will likely vault UMass into the Division I-AA Top 25 (when the polls come out today) for the first time since the beginning of the season.

"Everybody in the Yankee Conference measures what they produce by Delaware because they do things the right way," said UMass Coach Mike Hodges. "To beat a team like that makes me very proud. It's special, very special. It really feels good, especially when it's an important game like this."

Leading by only six points heading into the third quarter, Minuteman quarterback Andrew McNeilly marched the team 77 yards down the field in 10 plays on the first drive, with fullback Rene Ingoglia leaping over a crowd on fourth-and-goal to put UMass up 27-14.

Delaware struck back with a 1-yard keeper by QB Leo Hamlett to cut the lead to 27-21, but UMass put the game away on the next three possessions.

On third-and-four at the Delaware 20, tailback John Johnson took a McNeilly pitch and turned the left corner, heading all the way to the end zone for a 33-

A variety of events help make 1993 Homecoming a success

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

This weekend at the University of Massachusetts, school spirit was celebrated by students, faculty, members of the community and alumni. The Homecoming of 1993 was an overall success.

The pep rally and bonfire started off the weekend's festivities on Friday night. Around 400 people gathered around the campus pond between 6:30 and 7:30 p.m. This was the first pep rally in 20 years.

Football Coach Mike Hodges said a few words on how Homecoming should be a whole school celebration.

The Oompah band was also present and playing to add to the pep rally celebrations. The Oompah band consists of faculty members and alumni.

"There was a very good turnout to the pep rally and bonfire. This was the first one in a long time, and we are hoping every year it will get bigger. We all had a great time," said Ginny Rees, assistant director for on-campus events and administration.

The Homecoming parade began at 11:30 a.m. Saturday morning. It started at the Visitors Center and went up North Pleasant Street. The parade continued down Fearing Street and went directly to the McQuirk Alumni Stadium.

All of the floats gathered in the Visitors Center parking lot at 10:30 a.m. in order to be judged.

This year there were eight floats which reflected animated films. Films such as Alice in Wonderland and Peter

Atmosphere set stage for rivals

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts and the Delaware Blue Hens football programs intensified their rivalry Saturday afternoon.

Rivalry? Are the UMass-Delaware contests really a rivalry? Despite Delaware winning sixteen of the seventeen games heading into Saturday's game, are the Minutemen and Blue Hens true rivals?

If the physical, emotional, excitable, and thrilling UMass' 43-29 victory over the favored Blue Hens was not proof enough, somebody should notify the players and coaches on both teams.

The physical battle of both defense corps. The emotion of the Minutemen witnessed by the 13,102 who attended the Homecoming game at Warren

Tensions rising in Mogadishu

By MICHELLE FAUL
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Submachine gunfire crackled in central Mogadishu on Sunday, reflecting heightened tension on the eve of a protest that threatens to explode into clan violence.

Somalis said two people were killed and three wounded in an hourlong shootout among clan members over a water well. It took place in the southern Mogadishu stronghold of Gen. Mohamed Farrah Aidid, whose supporters continued their regular Sunday rally about a mile away.

Journalists saw one man being carried away in a wheelbarrow and another limp away with a bullet wound near the traffic circle where the city's main roads meet.

Members of Ali Mahdi Mohamed's clan who live in both halves of the divided city are supposed to meet at a stadium on the south side Monday. That means crossing the Green Line separating Ali Mahdi's territory in north Mogadishu from the Aidid controlled south.

Aidid's deputy, Mohamed Nur Aliyo, warned them again Sunday not to come.

"If they come over, we are not responsible for what will happen," Aliyo said to cheers from hundreds of people at the rally. "They want this to create problems, not support peace."

There are fears Ali Mahdi wants to provoke conflict in hopes the 33 nation U.N. army in Somalia will be forced to intervene and renew its fight with Aidid.

U.N. officials said Sunday they were trying to per-

Domestic violence on the rise

Expansion of laws has increased police response

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

The incidence of domestic violence have risen dramatically on campus in the last couple years, according to the University police department.

Before 1991, the numbers of domestic violence which the police responded to were less than 10 per year, said Lt. Barbara O'Connor. Now the numbers have risen dramatically.

The reason for the increased police response to domestic violence is that there was a change in definitions in 1991 to further protect victims and to expand the law to cover more relationships.

The change in law was inspired nation-wide by Tracy Thurman, a Connecticut woman, killed by her husband in front of police, Sgt. Robert Thrasher said.

Police routinely went to the Thurman household because the husband was beating his wife. The last time the police went to the house, the man was stabbing his wife in front of the police.

"The biggest concern with the new law," said Thrasher, "is the safety of the victim."

The new domestic violence laws, enacted in 1991 allow for a change in definition of a "household" and a tougher police response to abuse.

"They made this a powerful tool," Thrasher said.

The change particularly affects college campuses because of the new definition of a substantial dating relationship as a household and includes residential halls as households.

Under the new law, police may arrest an abuser of domestic violence if a judge deems the relationship as a substantial dating relationship.

The "preferred response" under the change in law of the Mass. General Laws, Chapter 209A is to make an arrest if there is probable cause of abuse.

Upon arrest, the person will be charged with assault and battery which is a misdemeanor. Or the individual may be arrested for a felon assault and battery if the use of a dangerous weapon is involved, which could include anything from a gun to a frying pan.

If the abuse is by a boyfriend on his girlfriend, the police must call a judge to determine if the relationship is indeed a substantial dating relationship.

An arrest may also be made in the case of homosexual relationships. The judge must determine if the relationship is a substantial dating relationship if the two do not live together.

In any relationship, hetero or homosexual, the judge will base a decision as to whether the relationship is a substantial dating relationship including factors such as length, intimacy and whether the individuals were engaged to be married.

Thrasher said in most instances, the judge will decide the relationship is substantial and an arrest can be made, but there have been a few cases where the judge said the relationship did not fit the definition.

In all other instances of family members by blood or marriage or people living together in the same household, the police are mandated by law to make an arrest on the spot if there is sufficient evidence of abuse.

The new law is not gender specific. A woman may be arrested for abusing another woman provided suade Ali Mahdi not to cross the line, fearing trouble since their troops no longer patrol much beyond the boundaries of their fortified compounds.

Peacekeepers only fire when they are in danger and do not interfere in clan clashes.

Saturday night, after he met with U.N. envoy Lansana Kouyate, Ali Mahdi broadcast a message saying marchers would cross the line by force, if necessary.

"Brothers from the north and from the south will shake hands... If anyone tries to interfere, we will cross by force," he said.

The demonstration threatened to spark internal clashes in Aidid's Somali National Alliance.

Sunday, pickups with armed guards toured south Mogadishu urging people to come out and march. Somalis said they were manned by dissidents from Aidid's alliance who believe he is obstructing peace.

Pan were represented.

Steve Ziolkowski, president of the Inter Fraternity Council, said the fraternities and sororities look forward to building the floats.

"The sororities and fraternities build these floats only days or even the night before the parade. It makes it more exciting," Ziolkowski said.

Two fraternities and one sorority are matched up together in making a float.

Every year the floats are judged on, and the winners receive a plaque. This years judges were Dr. James Abel, a physician at University Health Services; Michael Weisman, assistant director of the Greek area; Father Francis Lavelle, director of Newman Center; and two people from the Alumni Office.

Alpha Tau Gamma, Iota Phi Theta and Alpha Chi Omega made the Peter Pan float which came in first place. This was the third year that Alpha Tau Gamma won.

The marching band led off the parade. Following behind them were the HonorGuard from the police station and the cheerleading squad.

Chancellor David K. Scott and Alumni president Jack Leader rode behind them in a convertible. The eight Greek floats and the Umass mounted police were at the tail end of the parade.

In the tailgate area, thousands of people gathered before, during and after the game to celebrate Homecoming.

"All over campus Homecoming is celebrated in different areas, but it's here where everyone gathers together as one school," said Suzanne Sullivan, a junior exercise science major.

Not only were there UMass alumni present, but a group of Delaware alumni joined in on the Homecoming celebration as well.

The UMass Alumni Association had a booth set up giving away free popcorn in UMass megaphones. They also had activities such as karaoke and The Orbotron in the tailgating area.

"I have never seen so many students filled with school spirit at once. The tailgating area really helps in getting students to the football games. This year's Homecoming has really been great," said Stephanie Tache, a sophomore at UMass.

"This is a first-rate campus daily!"

Asian culture is finding a niche in filmmaking

By CATHY CHANG
Collegian Correspondent

The Asian American film community has reached a point where directors, writers and actors feel comfortable using their culture in expression, independent filmmaker and poet Russell C. Leong said in a lecture last week.

Leong traced the history of Asians in Hollywood, and their portrayal in film last Thursday night at Smith College.

"We are at a juncture. This is a good employable year," he said, referring to the increase of Asians in film and the success of such films as "The Joy Luck Club."

Leong said he is still searching for a vernacular that will unite the Asian American film community, which is more complex than Hollywood has portrayed.

Leong gave examples of how Hollywood erroneously combines all Asians together in stereotypical roles in movies, such as the Chinese Fu Manchu, the evil Japanese during World War II, or the demure Lotus Blossom and Hula Girl.

The challenge that Asian American filmmakers face now is to incorporate the appropriate metaphors in movies and to be unafraid of critique from within the community, according to Leong.

"We need an affiliation based on cultural ties, but this doesn't mean we can't criticize each other," Leong said.

The independent film community is especially appropriate for the new Asian directors and writers since the methods are cheaper and underrepresented groups, such as women, can make their voices heard, he said.

The use of video and documentaries also evoke empathy for the subject, since the straightforwardness of the format allows intimacy, he said.

The Asian American film community grew out of the 1960s, Leong said, amidst Civil Rights activism on college campuses. Leong and other colleagues were poets first, giving voice to their feelings and holding poetry readings with other Asian Americans, he said.

"The poets of the '60s became filmmakers," Leong said. "Both share a common visual capacity, and a search for metaphor."

"Making a film is not much different from writing a poem," he said.

The earliest Asian American movements were influenced and actively helped by African American groups during the sixties, he said. Ethnic communities helped each other within their shared urban areas.

Leong showed a documentary during the lecture that he directed of poet and close friend Janice Mirikitani entitled "Why is Preparing a Fish a Political Act?"

Mirikitani's poetry was read throughout the video, reflecting the alienation she felt growing up in an all-white community. "We are still incarcerated in our spirits and minds," she said in the documentary.

Leong grew up in Chinatown, San Francisco, and attended the San Francisco State University and the University of Taiwan. He received his Master of Fine Arts from the University of Southern California in Los Angeles.

Book by Adrienne Rich represents her struggles

By MARNI E. HELFNER
Collegian Staff

On Thursday, Adrienne Rich, well reknowned poet and writer, read from her newest book, WHAT IS FOUND THERE: Notebooks on Poetry and Politics. In an event organized by Robin Feldman, assistant to the director of the Five College Women's Studies Research Center, a pre-reading reception was followed by the reading in Chapin Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College.

Co-sponsored by WFCR and Odyssey Bookshop, the reception drew people from all over New England from as far as Vermont and Hartford. The reception gave people a chance to converse with Rich.

By the time Rich began the free reading in Chapin Auditorium, the 1200 seat auditorium was standing room only with people in the back and in the aisles.

Due to health reasons, Rich denied interviews to all press and cut her stay from a proposed two days to one evening. When she arrived at Chapin Auditorium, she was escorted in by staff of the Research Center and two security guards.

"We turn to a woman who has spent her whole life breaking boundaries, between artists and scholars, between white men and women of color, between lesbians and other feminists, between

"[Adrienne Rich is] a woman who has spent her whole life breaking boundaries, between artists and scholars, between white men and women of color, between lesbians and other feminists, between poetry and prose, a woman who sees politics as a process, and as a way of thinking of our lives."

poetry and prose, a woman who sees politics as a process, and as a way of thinking of our lives... she pushes us to have the courage and flexibility to cull inspiration from whatever sources might advance feminist thought, even if they come from dead white men, or from people whose cultures you were taught to ignore," said the Center's Director Gail Hornstein in her introduction.

Rich walked on stage with the aid of a cane and received a standing ovation in her honor. Rich commented before the reading, "It's wonderful to be back here in this valley, where I lived for five years, and I am deeply moved by your all being here."

"The book that I'm going to read from tonight is the book that [I've been] probably finding out how to write all my life. The struggle that it came out of is the struggle of my entire life and in a very real sense, I felt that this book, writing this book, I was coming out of the closet as a poet," said Rich.

Rich said the book was about "...things that I needed to write in prose for myself that concern poetry... but it is a kind of non-linear structure, more like the writing of a poem than the writing of an essay," she said.

In addition, Rich read the epigraphs from each of the chapters of her book, and then read several selections from What Is Found There, her 20th book.

Power perpetuated with pornography

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Correspondent

Using material from mainstream and available gay and straight male pornography magazines, film advertisements and sex tourism brochures, Adam Thorburn argued Wednesday night that the "sexual, political mission of pornography is to perpetuate men's power," and called for all men to act with women in ending violence against women.

Thorburn, a Masters of Fine Arts student at Sarah Lawrence College and co-chair of the Pornography Action Group of the Ending Violence Against Women Network, warned the audience at the outset of the lecture that the slides and analysis he would be presenting would be disturbing.

Beginning with slides from heterosexual male pornography such as Hustler, Playboy, Stroker and Young Girls, Thorburn conveyed how pornography is generated by, and perpetuates misogeny, racism and anti-Semitism.

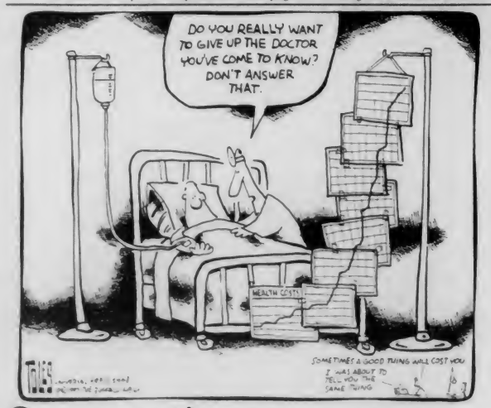
Using a series of photographs, Thorburn demonstrated the violence which covers the pages of all pornography, sending the message that women are sexual objects who ask for and enjoy being sexually assaulted or murdered.

"[In pornography] women are tortured for being women. Porn tells us that women enjoy pain and crave the violence that is done to them," Thorburn said.

According to Thorburn, misogyny is often combined with racism, and anti-Semitism to further oppress men and women of color, and Jewish women.

"[There is a] racist devaluing of women of color in pronography," Thorburn said.

Thorburn showed a series of photographs in which the Nazi SS is shaving a woman's head and sexually assaulting her, to display how "the suffering of historically persecuted groups is made exciting."



Countering the idea that women and in pornography choose their career and are rolling in cash, Thorburn sited statistics and revealed the nature of the sex industry world wide to show how women are often forced socially, psychologically and economically into pornography.

"[Many women] were coerced into the situation," Thorburn said, adding that 65-75 percent of women in pornography have been sexually abused, and most are victims of poverty.

Commenting on campus

I was cleaning out my head this past weekend after mid-terms ended and I stumbled across some random thoughts tucked away in the back of my mind that I thought I'd share with you, oh lucky reader.

• Note to the American Freedom Foundation: concentrate your efforts on attainable, meaningful goals like rededicating the Tower Library. Protesting the Minuteman mascot is such a ridiculously assinine complaint that your group will only alienate potential allies in the student body. In other words, get your priorities straight.

Michael
DAY

• Boy, was I ever impressed by the GEO's demonstration on October 14. Expecting a mature and well organized protest by graduate students over a valid issue? Think again.

The GEO did their best impersonation of a three year-old's temper tantrum as they left trash at the Chancellor's door instead of either resolving the conflict privately or staging a real protest that would at the very least gain them the respect of their peers.

• I wonder how the group that cleaned the Campus Pond avoided the wrath of that damn swan, easily the most vicious entity on this campus.

I saw a freshman reduced to tears the other day after the swan chased him for twenty yards. The poor guy was only trying to feed the ducks when the swan decided to polish up it's Commando skills on him.

• I guess Dick Vitale will be speaking literally the next time he says the fans at the Mullins Center were yelling so loud that they brought the house down.

John Calipari and company had better wear hard hats when they raise this year's banner to the rafters. You never know what might happen if those rafters become unbalanced.

• Did you ever get the feeling that the residents of Amherst don't particularly like the students of UMass? Yet to think of the metropolis these farmers would have on their hand if we were located elsewhere, it boggle the mind. I only wish they would enact more restrictive laws... perhaps an after dark military curfew?

• I'm pleased to see that amidst all of the academic cutbacks and faculty layoffs, the Administration can still find enough spare change to make a school-wide commitment to big time sports.

Yep, nothing really builds up a school's reputation like the size of their athletic department. By the way, do the Ivy League school still have football teams? Just checking.

• How many people do you think will go to a Halloween party dressed as either Beavis or Butt-Head this year? I'm banking on seeing at least ten per dorm.

Following that question, how many of these people will later be involved in fights as people begin to snap when conversation break down and are reduced to Uh, Huh-Huh, Huh-Huh? I think Amherst Police should place all of these people into protective custody upon sight to avoid future violence.

• Finally, I picked up a copy of The Minuteman the other day, and if you've never read an issue, I highly recommend it. This is such high quality literature, I'm surprised it is still free.

I really believe that with their style of mature, thought-provoking journalism they could make a fortune on a subscription service. Based on how well papers like The National Enquirer do each week, I know there must be somebody out there who would actually look forward to an issue of The Minuteman.

An obligation to know

This week, I'd like to do something I have never done before in this space. I'd like to write a little about myself.

I am in every conceivable way a member of the majority. I am white. I am a member of a Christian faith. I am middle class. I am heterosexual. I am male, and while men are technically a minority of the population, we are, unfortunately, still by far the more powerful of the two sexes. I am even a registered member of the nation's ruling political party.

Peter
ORVETTI

Because of these facts about myself, I could choose any career course I wish. I could put on a suit and tie and become a millionaire businessperson, an attorney, a doctor, or even a senator. I don't have to care about anything but making money and acquiring for myself, because I'm in the majority.

So sometimes people ask me, "Why do you care? Why don't you just keep your mouth shut and watch the money roll in?" I could do that. It's tempting. But people like me, people in the majority, have to care.

When I write my column each week, I usually react to something that has angered or disturbed me. I have been angered this week not by an article from the New York Times or a top story from CNN. The anger this week has come from some of the words I've heard in this community.

The two most dangerous forces known to humanity are not nuclear bombs and guns, nor are they masked men in alleyways and cruel leaders ordering war. The two most dangerous forces are hatred and ignorance. Lately, we have heard too much of both.

What bothers me is not so much that people hold ignorant views. A person is entitled to any opinion they wish, no matter how disgusting or stupid. What bothers me is that there are people who will see or hear these words and, feeling that the speaker has some knowledge that they do not, will take these ideas as fact.

In high school, people used to ask me what they should think about complex issues that they did not quite understand. In 1988, when I was in the ninth grade, I was asked if George Bush was "bad" and Mike Dukakis "good". I was frightened by the fact that whatever answer I gave would be taken as truth — that people who are not interested in politics would sooner sacrifice their opinion rather than find out for themselves what is going on in their world.

During the Moscow revolt a few weeks ago, a friend asked me, "Who's Morris Yeltsin?" It was funny at the time. It seems frightening to me now.

Ignorance is what feeds tyranny and oppression. Ronald Reagan was elected president on the basis of fear and division, and then proceeded to implement one of the most bigoted domestic policies since prior to the Civil War. Ignorance created all the people we now have the most cause to fear in our country: Ross Perot, Pat Robertson, Jesse Helms, Robert Dornan, Randall Terry, Pat Buchanan.

We in the majority have an obligation to know. The minority too often cannot defend themselves against ignorance. It is our responsibility to watch the news, to read the papers, to criticize our leaders.

Only those with power are able to bring some of that strength to the powerless, who have waited so long to claim their right to it. It is not our priviledge to be informed. It is our duty.

Even Adolf Hitler did not just appear one day in Berlin to lead his nation. Even he was risen to his post by the people, based on fear, hatred, and ignorance.

Who will be the next to ascend to power because of hate?

Peter Orvetti is a Collegian columnist.

Don't tamper with evidence

I want to call attention to recent instances of anti-Semitic graffiti and threats, several of which are being investigated by Public Safety.

While I understand the strong impulse to remove offensive or threatening graffiti as quickly as possible, I urge anyone discovering threats or hate graffiti of any kind to call public safety immediately, and remove the graffiti only after the campus police are able to arrive on the scene and begin their investigation. Threats and hate graffiti are often criminal violations of state law, and successful prosecutions require both prompt reporting and undisturbed evidence.

I also urge any member of the campus with information about authors of threats or graffiti to contact either Public Safety or the Dean of Students Office. Anonymous threats and hate graffiti are acts of cowardice that have no place in our campus community.

Ex-dancer offers her rebuttal

I am writing in response to Melanie DeSilva [Collegian, Oct. 21]. When did she speak to my colleagues Raquel Darian and Barbie Bridges? They have never told her where they went to college or how they feel about their chosen jobs. Actually, these women are not oppressed at all. They often do feel a sense of self-esteem because they are beautiful and intelligent enough to do whatever they want with their bodies. I wonder if Ms. DeSilva is not a bit jealous of this?

Have you ever been to either Anthony's or the Race St. Pub? Obviously not, or you would know they are very well run, clean bars. There are police on duty almost every hour that the bars are open and NO touching takes place. Men (and sometimes women) come to relax, have a beer and watch women dance. Yes, the dancers are tipped, so are the waitresses. What's the difference? No one can afford to work for free.

Some people think the men who patronize these types of bars and the women who work in them are "low life scum." As a former dancer myself I can tell you that this is rarely true. The men who come in are decent people who would rather watch us dance than vent their frustrations in other, more harmful ways. Many of the customer's wives have said to me, "I'd rather have him look at you than go out and cheat on me!"

I can understand how some people do not approve of or choose to take part in the "sex industry," as it is collectively called. However, judging what someone else wants to do is wrong, especially since it is perfectly legal. I have read the Bible from cover to cover and I never found where it said the human body was demeaning.

The Collegian is not a paper for young children, whom I agree need not be exposed to such ads. It is written for and by college students who can handle adult issues. If you do not like those bars, stay away from them, but do not take that form of release away from others.

Dancing made me feel good about myself and that improved my life. I did not feel like men owned me; it was like they appreciated me. I like to make people have fun and when I danced, I did just that. So Ms. DeSilva, the next time you want to give your opinion on something or someone, get your facts straight and do not put false words in our mouths.

Aimee Aquino
Southwest

Choose your words with care

In response to Melanie DeSilva's column [Collegian, Oct. 21], let me state firstly, that I do not disagree with any of the points made in your article on strip bar advertisements. However, your use of the term "blatant misogyny" is incorrect in the context at hand.

The word misogyny is defined by The American Heritage Dictionary as "Hatred of women," and while it may be true that the sex industry (i.e. pornography and exotic dancing) does perpetuate "an atmosphere... in which all women are seen as sex objects," it is doubtful that the advertisements for strip bars which appear in the Collegian are promoting animosity toward women.

I'd like to make it clear that I am not defending the above-mentioned ads, and also that I don't harbor any illusions regarding the fact that our patriarchal society often subordinates and exploits women.

My objective here is simply to discourage people from misusing such powerful words as misogyny when it is unwarranted.

Hateful, anti-female attitudes undoubtedly exist in the sex industry and elsewhere, but ads for places like the Race St. Pub are offensive at worst, and should not be pinpointed as contributing to that problem.

• Against the Minuteman

For the past two and one half weeks, faculty, administrators, alumni and students on this campus and around the country have been subjected to debate about changing the school mascot.

Students of color, whether they wanted the Minuteman changed or not, or just didn't give a damn, were forced "to choose sides."

Michele
MONTEIRO

Did students of color believe in the "outlandishness" of Martin Jones and his American Freedom Foundation, or did they truly believe that the symbol of a white man who probably owned slaves, ready to fight for the freedom of other whites at a moment's notice should remain as the symbol for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst?

It is true that African-Americans were "minutemen". It is true that women were ready at a moment's notice. It is also true that Randolph Bromery, UMass-Amherst's first and only African-American Chancellor, changed the mascot during his tenure in the 1970s from the Redmen to the Minutemen in order to respect the campus' small Native American population.

Why, then, all the fuss?

It is amazing to see people who claim to be liberal inclusionists revert to staunch separatists when challenged.

When one refers to tradition, one has to examine whose historical tradition he or she is referring to.

Descendants of African-Americans bound physically and mentally for three hundred years as "chattle" in both North and South America, of Native Americans forced to move from their land to reservations, of Mexican-Americans forced to cede their land to the United States after the Spanish American war, and of Asian-Americans, the prisoners at internment camps during World War II should all be proud of this country's tradition of freedom.

Right?

The Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Susan Trausch of the Boston Globe, Rush Limbaugh, alumni, faculty, and students should examine the context within which the argument for the changing of the school mascot was made, instead of personally attacking one student, Martin Jones, in a media frenzy.

The proposed debate of the changing of a visual symbol is not to obliterate the past but to bring it to the present and future.

Fifty percent of this country's population by the year 2000, will be comprised of people of color. Whose history will we study then? European American history?

The issue again for those who were caught in the frenzy of making the mascot personal is one of invisibility.

The point?

Those students arguing for a change, with not only the mascot but other issues of inclusion, are not trying to take away feeble pride. They are just trying to raise consciousness about the effect of traditional symbols, and institutions of a majority upon a minority.

People who feel strongly about retaining the Minuteman as a symbol, aside from revealing their insecurities, and forming personal attacks, should use this debate as a forum for mature discussion of issues concerning race, sex and class rather than a closed-minded vehicle for disposing racist sentiments.

Michele Monteiro is the Collegian's Black Affairs Editor.

• For the Minuteman

Ten score and 18 years ago, our forefathers took on a task of historical precedence and monumental proportion: they attempted to wrestle free from the oppressive rule of the British monarchy and brave the New World under their own power.

This was not a task which was decided upon quickly or easily; on the contrary, many colonial settlers were apprehensive and went into battle only after much consternation.

Michael
MORRISSEY

These Americans who initially took up arms in an effort to free all of our people were called Minutemen because of their ability to mobilize in a short period of time. The first Minutemen were from Massachusetts. The battles they fought made us a free country. That's a reason to be proud.

War exists. To deny so is to bury our heads in the sand. As long as it does, people must be there to fight. Farmers and laborers. People with families. These were the Minutemen.

The Minutemen had apprehensions. Some could not bear to fight against their British brothers for a sustained period. Others could not always leave their pregnant wives or destitute farms. Eventually, to gain independence, the United States had to organize a standing Continental Army.

This fact cannot be denied, however: when the time for battle came near in Massachusetts, the Minutemen organized. They fought. And they won.

Without the help of the colonial women, the United States would not have won the Revolutionary War. The Minutewomen stepped up and kept the homes and farms running while their spouses fought.

Without the help of thousands of Blacks, free men who came North, the United States would not have won the Revolutionary War. While slavery still existed in the South, these Minutemen were welcomed as brothers, and they fought right next to their White compatriots.

To say that women and Blacks were oppressed by the Minutemen is not only false but a blatant attempt to slant the issue. Minutemen and women were patriots. They were idealists.

The mascot was changed in 1972 from the Redmen, a term which is derogatory towards Native Americans. Debate on campus ensued, and Minutemen won out. The mascot was a perfect fit for our state university. It still is.

A chancellor with ancestry from the British Empire who has never lived in the state before cannot understand our history. But he should understand our wishes.

Between 90 and 95 percent of the campus wants to keep the mascot, by one estimation. Alumni are nearly 100 percent in favor of the mascot.

This is not tyranny of the majority. People have debated the issue. They have heard the arguments, and they have spoken. Loudly.

Nearly everyone has drawn up sides on the issue, and campus discussion has made the accomplishments of every Minuteman resonate even louder, because it reemphasizes their contribution to our country.

Yes, the Minutemen used guns. They had to so that we can be where we are today. However, the Minutemen were not sexist and were not racist. The mascot is not offensive, except to those without an understanding of our history.

Michael Morrissey is a Collegian columnist.

Minuteman Mailbag

I think these kids should lighten up and get a life. The Minuteman is the symbol of American independence, and stands for everything in this country that allows you to shoot your mouths off without performing so much as one day's service in the name of the United States.

But hey, as a 90's kind of happenin' dude, I'd like to offer a suggestion for a new UMass nickname, should the administration fold up its tent again and kowtow to a few malcontents.

May I offer: "The University of Massachusetts Physically Disadvantaged Gay and Lesbian Multicultural Developmentally Delayed Fightin' Persons."

Joseph D. Amato, '68
S. Dartmouth

If the University decides that the logo needs to be changed, I hope it remembers the democratic process on which our country was established and puts the logo debate to a vote. If the University wants to be politically correct, all persons affiliated with UMass past, present and future, should have a say in this matter.

Tom Wisnauckas
Easthampton

A current rereading of George Orwell's 1984 led me to draw a number of disturbing parallels. Winston, the protagonist of this novel, spends hours revising or erasing historical records, newspapers, magazines etc. to validate the current reality, and since today's reality will not be tomorrow's, everything is constantly changing. There is no truth in history. Everything is mutable and consequently ultimately meaningless. To coincidentally read about this current movement to change the mascot again, really struck a raw nerve.

The reality is that the Minuteman reflects a valid piece of Ma. history, one that we should be proud of. Let's avoid the world of 1984, and allow our history to remain. The present grows out of the past, and to be ashamed of that past and to try to obliterate it is a serious mistake. Certainly there are events and movements in our nation's history we should not be proud of, but that does not blacken and invalidate all history.

Noreen Blank Goldwasser, '67
Newton Centre

As an African-American woman, I see absolutely nothing wrong with the University's mascot being the Minuteman. It is not a symbol of racism, it is a symbol of freedom. It is part of the heritage of the state of Massachusetts and the University.

The state is considering yet another budget cut to this campus. Back in the "good old days" (five years ago) this campus was in an uproar because of the pathetic budget the University was actually operating on. Besides protesting here, we brought our case to Boston with all of the other state colleges and universities in Ma. for one of the largest protests on the Boston Common. We demanded that the state make education a priority, not a bargaining chip.

Now, the same old thing is happening again up on Beacon Hill, and what is being covered in the media? A bunch of people complaining about a mascot. If this image being portrayed is that this campus does not care about anything but what the mascot is, then no wonder they are going to cut our budget!

Here's a reality slap my friends — we may not need a mascot because there won't be a campus left once Beacon Hill is finished with us. Let's concentrate on more important things. We can't be complaining about the color of the sails while the ship is sinking.

Mikhaela Houston

Men like Paul Revere, John Hancock and Samuel Adams risked their lives for the idea that people should have the opportunity to choose their own destiny. Minutemen died at Lexington and Concord to make that idea a reality. These men died so that people like Martin Jones will have the Constitutional right to spew their virulent anti-Caucasian bigotry and ignorance any time they please. How sadly ironic.

Some people have not developed the skills that make impressions upon society in positive ways. An example of this is the method Martin Jones has chosen. His unprovoked attack against a symbol of our heritage is only a way of bringing attention to himself.

Thomas Smith

Those opposed...

Most of us accept unquestioningly that we stand for democracy, the right of self-determination and a respect for all viewpoints, however unsettling. Yet, is this true?

In Amherst, at an institution that is committed to the rhetoric (at least) of free inquiry and diversity, those who would dare to question the legitimacy of the current logo are severely ostracized. Chancellor David Scott, who reneged on an earlier commitment to study the origins of the logo, inadvertantely sent students and faculty a disturbing, albeit common, message: Stick to your principles until such time as others with money and clout force a moral retreat.

The fact is, the Minuteman symbol has served to marginalize less popular features of our history. Despite the rebels' valor in Lexington and Concord, today we need to be reminded of other forms of oppression and their historical roots. In closing, Martin Jones and Sharon Cousins deserve our thanks for reminding us of our other history we'd rather deny.

R. Jay Allain, '73
Springfield

Can we talk? Aren't symbols important? Isn't it valid — especially in a university community — to discuss from time to time the symbols that represent us? Wasn't Chancellor David Scott right in being open-minded about the questions raised? And what do most of us really think about the current logo? How popular is a symbol that since January — when the university began collecting licensing fees on the logo — has collected only some $5,500. I think at most universities, when we are talking logo licensing fees, we are talking big bucks.

Prof. Sara Grimes
Journalism Dept.

How do the people eliminate from power a university dictator who has closed debate on an issue of cultural importance? Isn't it time for the minority to take direct action to free us from the chains of the past so that the university can engage in free thought?

So, enlightened minority, how about staging a non-violent coup? Isn't it time we also replaced the American flag outside the Whitmore Administration building with an Earth flag to represent that the philosophy of a Neutopian administration is urgently needed to lead us into an era of global synergy.

they are considered a household.

The new law also extends to college dormitories. There is some judge discretion to determine what is a household, for example if the JFK Tower is a household. Thrasher said the judge usually rules a household as sharing common space such as lounges and bathrooms.

Roommates in college dorms are consider a household and can be arrested for domestic violence if there is abuse of one roommate upon the other.

Abuse is defined in the law as: attempting to cause physical harm, threatening harm or causing another to engage in sexual acts through force or duress.

If the domestic violence laws are violated, police determine the individuals are a household and there is enough evidence, and emergency restraining order will go into effect.

In the case of a roommate being arrested for violation of the domestic violence law and a restraining order going into effect, one roommate will be moved out of the room.

"This is a multi-disciplinary approach," Thrasher said. Different organizations on campus all contribute, such as Housing Services, Hillel House, the Newman Center and the Dean of Students Office. Each participates in resolving a domestic dispute between two roommates and find housing for the individual being moved.

"Housing Services is uncomfortable in making paying students leave their room," O'Connor said.

However, by law the student must be moved in order to comply with the restraining order which typically is a no contact order requiring a distance of at least 100 yards to be maintained.

If two students are in the same class and one has a restraining order against the other, the student must drop the class because it would be a violation of the law despite the fact the student paid for the class. The legality of the restraining order comes before educational pursuit.

"Too bad, so sad as the judge says," said Thrasher.

However, in some cases a student may talk with the judge and be allowed to stay in the class if there is no contact between the two individuals involved in the restraining order.

O'Connor said the police typically respond to domestic violence between a male and a female in a dating relationship where the man abuses the woman. Thrasher said alcohol is usually involved.

"A lot of what we see is from off campus," Thrasher said. A woman's boyfriend from another town may come to campus and abuse her. In this case, she can obtain a restraining order in Amherst which will be good all over the state and possibly even the country.

"The true cycle of abuse is women don't see that anything is wrong," O'Connor said. "The purpose of this law is to break the cycle."

According to Thorburn, the woman in Deep Throat, a popular pornography film, has revealed that her husband Jack Trainer forced her by gunpoint to perform the acts shown in the film.

Thorburn said rape is common within gay pornography, as men are shown demonstrating their strength to overpower other men. As in heterosexual pornography, men being raped enjoy it, yet are transformed into more masculine, powerful, sexual men because of the experience.

"The raped male is robust and full of vigor. He comes away feeling more virile and potently male," Thorburn said.

According to Thorburn, the goals of straight and gay male pornography is the same, and is a societal ritual shared by men as a class. Pornography, Thorburn said is a "celebration of male commentary."

When asked by an audience member how he responds to people who associate him with the Christian Right, he said that the way "pornography and the Right wing treat women are identical." The Church, like pornography, according to Thorburn, oppresses women, strips them of their sexuality, and teaches that "women's bodies are dirty."

Festival lights up S.U.B.

By Beth Goldstein
Collegian Corespondent

The first annual "Festival of Lights" celebration, presented by the South Asian Dance and Music Program, drew a sold-out crowd yesterday in the Student Union Ballroom.

"We thought there would be enough room for all the people," said Ranjanaa Devi, Director of the South Asian Music and Dance Program, and organizer of the celebration, who regretted having to turn people away at the door.

According to Devi, the festival was the first of its kind planned by the newly created department.

The festival consisted of a variety of programmed events which began with South Indian Music at noontime, followed by a script of prayer recitations chanted in Sanskrit and then in English.

After the prayers came the highlight of the festival, the "Court of Heavenly Beings" dance, which was a presentation of a procession of gods, goddesses, demons, and celestial attendants descending from above to celebrate with earthly beings, and to participate in the "human experience." The presentation lead the entire audience to stand up and clap to the music at the end.

After the dance, the audience and the participants of the show waited in line for lunch at the Earthfoods cafeteria. The food, which was served buffet-style, was provided by the "India House" restaurant, located in Northampton. During lunch, a typical South Asian wedding simulation took place in the Cape Cod Lounge, where there were also tables set up for selling South Asian memorabilia.

There was a variety of events after lunch, including an art exhibit held in the Student Union Gallery, Henna decoration, a bazaar, a children's workshop in calligraphy, a video presentation, and storytelling. The festival ended with traditional folk and classical dancing.

Devi was very happy with the number of people who attended, as well as the diversity of the crowd. Besides the South Asian people who came from as far away as Connecticut and Boston, there were many other participants of various ethinc and racial backgrounds.

Photos display multiracial families

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

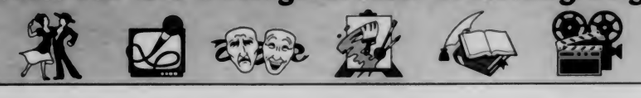
The A.P.E. Gallery in Thorne's Marketplace, Northampton, is currently filled with wonderful photographs - photographs of families: parents, children, family pets. They are part of the exhibit "Portraits of Multiracial Families", featuring the work of Peggy Gillespie and Gigi Kaeser, which opened Sunday, Oct. 17.

On opening day the A.P.E. Gallery was filled with enthusiastic people as well as boisterous children. Gillespie and Kaeser captured in their work families representing towns all over the Pioneer Valley, from Turners Falls to Northampton to Amherst.

People featured came from all different career paths, from psychotherapists to retail managers. Children photographed were all ages. They all shared one thing, however - all the families are comprised of differing racial identities.

Art Review

Under each of the photos was a statement from each of the family members, relating their experiences in a multiracial family. Many related stories of difficulties they experienced due to society's lack of acceptance. Some of the children having been adopted. Some of the parents being homosexual.



Most of the families related stories of their own experiences with racism as well as their thoughts about race issues, racism and the meaning and importance of multiracial families.

"Nobody decides to be racist," said Jose Abad, 12. "People are taught to be racists."

More than just having multiracial identities in common, all of the families photographs in the A.P.E. Gallery share another aspect - they capture and convey the love shared by these family members. Children are embraced by parents, ride bikes together and are captured in stunning off-guard moments.

"Portraits of Multiracial Families" will run until November 2 at the A.P.E. Gallery in Thorne's Marketplace. It will then travel onto the Amherst public schools.

Graduate Training in the Biological and Biomedical Sciences
The University of Connecticut Health Center

In pursuit of its goal of training students for research and teaching careers in the Biomedical Sciences, the University of Connecticut Health Center invites interested students to join us. The Health Center is a research, education, and patient care center consisting of a division of the Graduate School of the University of Connecticut, the School of Medicine, School of Dental Medicine, and John Dempsey Hospital. The Health Center provides an outstanding educational and research environment. It is located in in the town of Farmington, just west of Hartford, on a 150 acre campus atop a hill overlooking the scenic Farmington Valley. It is close to ski areas, hiking trails and facilities for boating, fishing and swimming. Boston and New York can be reached in two hours by car or bus.

Programs leading to the Ph.D. degree are offered in the following areas:

Cell Biology — Developmental Biology
Immunology — Molecular Biology & Biochemistry
Neuroscience — Oral Biology

Pharmacology and Cell & Molecular Toxicology

Graduate assistantships consisting of stipend support of $13,800 including excellent health benefits and a tuition waiver are available for qualified Ph.D. students.

Combined degrees including MD/Ph.D, MD/MPH, DMD/Ph.D, or DMD/MPH are available.

Programs leading to the Master's degree are offered in:
Public Health — Dental Science

We invite undergraduates to apply for summer research internships with stipends.

Applications for all programs from minorities and women are encouraged.

Jelley took a pass in front of the net from Holly Hockenbrock and redirected it past Husky keeper Jennine Portante. The goal was Jelley's 11th on the season, while the senior co-captain Hockenbrock collected her 16th assist.

Connecticut got the equalizer moments later as Massachusetts keeper Hilary Rose came way out of the net to make a save, leaving the net unminded. The ball got by her and Husky senior Jennifer Sinco collected a pass from teammate Tara Morris and tipped it into the lower right corner at 14:54.

"That's the worst possible thing that we could've let happen," said Hixon. "We had the momentum after the score, but we got soft and let them tie it up right away and get back into the game."

The defensive lapse proved uncostly, as freshman Kyle Rothenberger scored unassisted at 16:12 when she shot a ball from the top of the circle that deflected off Portante and dribbled into the net. The goal was Rothenberger's fifth of the year and all five have been game-winners.

Hockenbrock finished out the scoring when she and junior sweeper Natalie Hart worked the give-and-go on a penalty corner at 55:54.

The contest was marked by highly physical play, stick fouls and penalty cards, which is to be expected when these two rivals hook up, according to Hixon. Massachusetts received two green cards — one each for Hart and Hockenbrock — and one yellow card — sophomore Andrea Cabral.

Highlighting the defensive effort of the Minutewomen was Hockenbrock's performance of marking Connecticut junior and U.S. National Team member Kristen Kelly.

"Holly was in her face all day," Hixon said. "She just shut her down and completely frustrated her."

There's a possibility the Minutewomen will travel to Boston Tuesday night to resume their game with BU and then they take their act on the road to face Duke and North Carolina this weekend.

field, mobbing the Minuteman all-time leading scorer.

"I'm so proud," said Lloyd Jacobs, Randy's father. "We have a newspaper headline that says 'Scoring Dynamo' from when Randy was seven years old."

At 17:05 UMass forward Dave Siljanovski was taken down right outside the box. The ensuing indirect kick was tapped across by midfielder Mike Doyle to Jacobs who scored past a screened Tonkin, giving the Minutemen a 1-0 lead.

UMass added to its lead when midfielder Kevin Martin stormed down the left side and floated a lob to the front of the net that was headed in by captain Todd Kylish at 20:55.

The Minutemen made it 3-0 at 23:46 when Doyle intercepted a Textile pass, took one dribble and fired a shot over the shoulder of a surprised Tonkin.

Midfielder Brad Miller made a great run through the Textile defense and slid the ball to Jacobs, who put it past the Ram goalie at 37:10, making it 4-0.

In the second half, UMass forward Justin Edelman picked up a dropped corner kick by Tonkin and put it in the open net upping the margin to 5-0. At 64:59 Tomas Johansson took a shot from just inside the circle, only to have Edelman deflect the ball past the overwhelmed Tonkin for his second goal of the day.

Jacobs' two history making goals finished out the UMass scoring; the eight goals are the highest total for the Minutemen since 1968. Textile's Mike Petry spoiled Minuteman goalie Mark Wolf's shutout bid at 78:15 by knocking in a deflected clearing attempt.

"We needed a win like this, we had a tough practice week with some sole searching and even finger pointing, but we showed how good we can play," Coach Sam Koch said.

UMass improved to 7-10, Textile falls to 8-7-2. The Minutemen, with no hope of making the Atlantic 10 Tournament, have two games left with Fairfield coming to Garber Field on Wednesday.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION
Flu Immunization Clinic Update
There has been an overwhelming positive response to the Flu Immunization Campaign this Fall and the Health Services has been immunizing an average of 850 people per day through outreach clinics. Progress is being made toward reducing the number of susceptible individuals on the campus therefore reducing the potential of influenza this season.
DUE TO THE LIMITED AVAILABILITY OF THE FLU VACCINE, THE NUMBER OF REMAINING FLU IMMUNIZATION CLINICS MUST BE REDUCED.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A timely trip or letter helps you obtain the funds or favors you need. Once others are convinced that your plan is good for everyone, support quickly grows.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your sharp eye could spot stylish career attire on a bargain table. You may be able to turn casual chats with VIPs into big prospects. A new locale proves fun tonight. Nurture romance.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You are in an enterprising mood now, eager to upgrade your residence and add to your possessions. Your powers of persuasion prove hard to resist. Invest more time and effort in a literary project.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your creativity makes new procedures click. You finish a work or home project in record time. Discuss any financial concerns with a trusted family member.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Social plans made just for fun could yield hidden benefits. A long-desired goal moves within reach. Without support from your loved ones, your career plan could nosedive. Seek their advice.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The financial outlook brightens. Change is difficult but necessary. A complication may leave you wondering. Take a loved one's words at face value. Focus your energies.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You now experience greater balance in your life. Refuse to be rushed into making far-reaching decisions. An unconventional person aids an important personal quest.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): An imaginative approach helps you find the best solution to a recurring problem. Tonight is a good time to run, walk or stretch. What you visualize can come to pass.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The clock is ticking on unfinished work. Do not let rumors or faulty information throw you off track. Giving that extra mile is important for success. Comment a loved one whose romance is on the rocks.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your enthusiasm for a creative venture reigns, thanks to someone's encouragement. The outside resources or talents you need become available. Others willingly follow your example.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Today's events may show you have only seen the tip of the iceberg where a domestic situation is concerned. Thinking big will help you find success. Put romance on hold.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The action is all backstage today. You see a hard-to-spot opportunity to enhance a relationship. Take the wraps off a secret plan. Create strong foundations in your home and family life.

21 UMass advantage.

Johnson had 176 yards (an average of 9.8 yards per carry) on the day, making it the third consecutive week both he and Ingoglia (141 yards) broke the century mark.

After the UMass defense stifled Delaware on three plays, the offense got another TD — this time through the air. Ingoglia took a McNeilly pass over the middle and made possibly his best run of the year, bouncing off five or six tacklers for 39 yards on his way to his third score. UMass added a 29-yard fourth quarter field goal by Eric Oke to go up 43-21.

"This is not a happy, happy day for me," said Delaware Coach Tubby Raymond, who saw his team fumble seven times, including the game's last play. "It's one of the bad days at Black Rock, when every time we started something, something bad would happen."

The key was the effectiveness on both sides in neutralizing the Blue Hens. With the offensive line blowing Delaware off the line play after play, it seemed like the Blue Hens linebackers or secondary had to make every tackle.

"They did a great job," said Delaware linebacker Matt Morrill. "They just came out fired up. We had a chance to come up big, and we didn't do that."

On the other side, UMass manhandled an offensive line that usually allows its quarterbacks to throw for 200 yards and Brown to rush for 160. The players said the game plan was superb.

"The game plan [defensive coordinator Bill] McGovern drew up for us was so easy," said linebacker Scott Assencoa. "I can't believe how simple it was out there. We didn't have to think, we just reacted. It was 95 percent coaching and five percent utilization."

"Coach McGovern's game plan was great," said Mario Perry. "The whole defensive staff does an excellent job. What they do is treat you like a friend and tell you they have confidence for you to get the job done."

The Minutemen and Blue Hens traded touchdown in the first quarter, with UMass jumping out first on Ingoglia's 3-yard run. McNeilly (two TDs) and Langan swapped scoring runs, and then the UMass signal-caller put them ahead before the half with a 10-yard keeper. Hodges said the score was a key one.

"Any time you can score a TD on Delaware it's a big score," said Hodges. "We're right where we want to be right now. We just have to make sure that the rest of the way, every time we play, our opponents walk off the field with one extra loss."

McGuirk Stadium. The exciting breakaway runs of guys like John Johnson and up-the-gut, tackle-breaking, spin-off moves of Rene Ingoglia. The thrill of just viewing this battle of league foes.

The Minutemen made their biggest win of the season look effortless. The backfield was relentless, racking up a team-record 476 yards on the ground. Johnson gained a season-high 176 yards on just 18 carries (9.8 yards a carry), which included a beautiful 46-yard run in the first half and a 20-yard touchdown run in the third quarter.

Ingoglia was his normal self as he rambled for 141 yards on 28 carries. Ingoglia, the leading rusher in the Yankee Conference with 951 yards, exemplified his talents on an amazing 29-yard run in the third quarter, running up the middle and breaking four tackles before being taken down at Delaware's 10-yard line. Vintage Ingoglia.

The Minuteman defense was exceptional. The 29 points put on the scoreboard by Delaware does not tell the story. What tells the story is that the Blue Hens garnered only 315 total yards, compared to the 533.5 yards they had averaged in their previous six games. Tailback Darryl Brown, who last week captured YanCon offensive honors for his 203 yard effort against Villanova, was held to just 52 yards.

In a game filled with hard hits and high fives, every defensive player on the field for UMass contributed to stuffing the Blue Hens at one point or another. The Minutemen forced Delaware to fumble on seven different occasions, with fullback Lanue Johnson coughing up the ball three times.

UMass also intercepted a Keith Langan pass as Breon Parker came up with his sixth pick-off of the year.

The defense was partly responsible for the Blue Hens having the ball just 23:27 of the 60-minute game. The Minutemen also stopped Delaware on third downs, as the Blue Hens converted just three out of 12 chances. And, they had four quarterback sacks. And they had four pass deflections.

Saturday's game was a must-win game, and the Minutemen won it. UMass dominated every facet of the game. The entire Minuteman team was on an emotional high, and would not succumb to the powerful Blue Hens.

"Just to be able to come into a game like Homecoming against a team like them, and beat them," said Johnson. "I don't know what to say other than that it feels really good."

"It's unity," said Perry. "That's all it really is. Team unity."

IF YOU THOUGHT COLLEGE WAS EXPENSIVE, TRY PUTTING YOURSELF THROUGH RETIREMENT.

Think about supporting yourself for twenty-five, thirty years or longer in retirement. It might be the greatest financial test you'll ever face. Fortunately, you have one valuable asset in your favor. Time.

Time to take advantage of tax-deferral. Time for your money to grow.

But starting early is key. Consider this: if you begin saving just $100 a month at age thirty, you can accumulate $154,031* by the time you reach age sixty-five. Wait ten years and you'd need to set aside $211 a month to reach the same goal.

At TIAA-CREF we not only understand the value of starting early, we can help make it possible—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research are already enrolled in America's largest retirement system. Find out how easy it is to join them. Call today and learn how simple it is to put yourself through retirement when you have time and TIAA-CREF on your side.

Start planning your future. Call our Enrollment Hotline 1 800 842-2888.

in on the left side and slapped one, beating Kilduff on the short side.

The Warriors smelled blood, and after Atkinson scored on a sloppy UMass clear attempt (at 2:56) and Adams one-timed in front for his second goal (at 3:35), Kilduff was out of there.

Down 5-0, Mallen called a timeout, yanked Kilduff and inserted Rich Moriarty, the backup from Wilbraham. Mallen said he had two reasons for pulling his goalie.

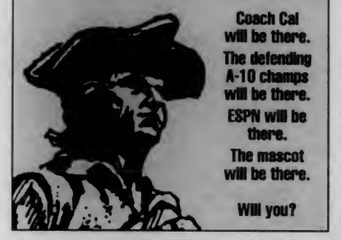
"One was to stem the tide. Dave did a good job in the first period to keep us in the game," said Mallen. "The other was to give Rich a chance to see what he could do."

Moriarty shut the Warriors down for the rest of the period, but the offense couldn't break through on Martin Legault.

Merrimack got three in the third before the Minutemen could give fans what they had been waiting for — the first goal of the year.

Converted forward Armand Latulippe took a clearing pass from Holland at the red line and slipped between two defenders after deking to the outside. His wrist shot at 12:18 beat Legault and broke the shutout.

"It was nice to get the first goal," said Latulippe. "I was trying to split the two defensemen. They overcommitted and I cut back and beat the goalie."



Six minutes later, Latulippe notched another when he moved in front of the net from the back of the left side to end scoring at 8-2.

"Boy, am I glad I moved Armand to forward last week," Mallen said. "He likes the frontline, but I think he's an even better defenseman."

A reporter made an analogy of playing Big 10 football at UMass after not fielding a team last year and losing to Northwestern 35-14 in the season opener. It was a little worse than that (UMass was outshot 54-24), but the analogy holds up pretty well.

"I told the guys, 'You never want to be happy with a loss,' but I think it was a good start," Mallen said. "There's no doubt in my mind the guys played hard, they worked hard till the end."

Even though it controlled the play, UMass could not get the goal back until the 79th minute, when freshman Erin Lynch, from the center of the field, slid a pass to LeDuc, who was running down the left slot. From 15 yards out, LeDuc shot to the right of Gelfenbien.

UMass' play only strengthened after the LeDuc goal, while UConn began to lag. UMass owned the 30 minutes of overtime.

"After the LeDuc goal we had a let down," UConn Coach Len Tsantaris said. "That goal changed everything, they were playing very emotional. We didn't really connect, we missed passes and were on our heels. Overtime was very emotional for UMass. They got one early on and we tried to get things going but they were just too much for us."

The win places UMass as the top team in the North going into its final week of regular season play. The Minutewomen are now considered the favorite to host the NCAA Regional Tournament on Nov 11-12.

Wilkins' kick KOs No. 5 Connecticut

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

This one was smash-mouth soccer. NFC East soccer.

It was decided because of a physically dominating defense, loads of emotion and big plays from non-stop offensive pressure. And the decision in the New England, women's collegiate heavyweight soccer battle went to the University of Massachusetts, 2-1, in overtime, over fifth-ranked Connecitcut.

Connecticut	1
Massachusetts	2

The Minutewomen (12-2-3), ranked No. 8 last week and likely to move into the top 5 nationally this week, found themselves down 1-0 at the half, but played a relentless, high octane final 75 minutes of soccer to comeback and post the win, in front of 870 fans at Garber Field.

The rally was capped when senior sweeper Paula Wilkins drilled a perfect 22-yard direct kick, just over the UConn defensive wall and just into the upper left corner of the Huskie net, with just 4:42 gone in the first overtime. UConn goalkeeper Jill Gelfenbien had no shot at the save.

"I was going shot all the way," said Wilkins, who hit a similar overtime game-winner against Boston College in the season opener. "I felt really good, felt on. I just tried to visualize it going in and it did."

UConn sweeper Karen Ferguson said, "It was a perfect shot by Paula. There was no way we could defend it."

While the second half and overtime belonged to the Minutewomen (UMass outshot the Huskies 14-5 during those periods), UConn took a 1-0 lead on the strength of a Ginny Woodward goal in the 16th minute and the edge in play into the half.

"In the first half we outplayed them and outpossesed them, but we didn't out-hustle them," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "We weren't playing with that old fashioned, blue collar, American work ethic. We didn't work very hard in the first half."

That changed after the break, as UMass, fueled by the insertions of forward Rachel LeDuc and midfielder Colleen Milliken into the lineup, hammered the Huskies, winning countless loose balls and physically wearing down the UConn defense.

"We were hustling out there and that was embellished by the addition of LeDuc and Milliken," Rudy said. "Milliken just burned the left flank and LeDuc was winning ball after ball after ball."

Milliken took a more offensive role than a wing midfielder normally would, but Wilkins and her defensive brethren, Heidi Kocher and Amy Trunk, picked up the slack by stuffing the Huskies on each possession. In overtime, despite pressing, UConn managed only one shot on net.

Career milestones reached by Hixon, Jacobs

• Coach Hixon nabs 250th in 3-1 win

Collegian Staff

Lightning never strikes twice, just ask University of Massachusetts Field Hockey Coach Pam Hixon. Last Thursday night, a bolt of lightning caused a suspension in the Minutewomen's game against Boston University and delayed the inevitable — Hixon's 250th career win.

A sunny, blue sky was the backdrop on Saturday, insuring that Mother Nature would have no say in the matter. No. 3 Massachusetts (14-1 overall, 4-0 in the Atlantic 10) took care of the rest, downing No. 20 University of Connecticut 3-1, and earning Hixon her milestone in front of an appreciative Senior Day crowd at Totman Field.

"It's always great to be able to do something like this at home," Hixon (250-66-18) said. "It's actually a relief to finally get it. I'm glad it's over with."

The Minutewomen jumped out on top at 13:52 as senior co-captain Tara

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team rolled over Philadelphia Textile 8-1 on Saturday with senior forward Randy Jacobs rewriting the history books. Jacobs became the school's all-time leading goal and point scorer by netting four goals on the day.

Jacobs scored twice in the first half and and broke the school record at 76:13 by floating one over Textile goalie John Tonkin to the upper right hand corner of the net. Jacobs then added career goal No. 39 by blasting one from the top of the box past Tonkin.

"It's a great feeling to have the record, my teammates set me up all day, I had plenty of time to shoot on the last two goals," said Jacobs.

After breaking the record, Jacobs dropped to his knees and raised his arms towards the sky. The UMass bench emptied as everyone ran to the middle of the

Minutemen fall on Warrior ice

NORTH ANDOVER — When the University of Massachusetts hockey team took to the ice at the Volpe Complex against Merrimack College last Saturday night, there was one team from Hockey East and one playing its first season in fifteen.

It wasn't difficult to tell who was who.

Massachusetts	2
Merrimack College	8

The young Minutemen (0-1) showed poise in the opening period but allowed four goals in two and a half minutes in the second and fell 8-2.

Junior Matt Adams netted two goals and two assists, and senior Rob Atkinson added five points as the Warriors (2-0) taught UMass what life was like in Division I hockey.

"We got the program off and running and faced a tough opponent," said UMass Coach Joe Mallen. "Overall, I think we have a lot of talent to build on."

"We were shocked at how fast a style of hockey this was," said defenseman Tiger Holland. "We came out a little flat on our heels in the second period maybe thinking we could skate with them. Down deep, we might've doubted we could keep up with them, and then they got those four quick ones."

Down 1-0 after the first intermission, UMass starting goalie Dave Kilduff was lucky to be alive. He was peppered with 16 shots on net, and it seemed like Merrimack had a relentless charge.

An interference call on UMass center Mike Evans put Merrimack on the power play to begin the second, and it didn't take them long to capitalize.

Adams took a pass from Atkinson on the right side and beat Kilduff in front at 0:44 for the 2-0 advantage. Twenty-one seconds later, left wing Jim Gibson broke

Haiti in chaos

U.S. pleads for international action

By DAVID BEARD
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — U.N. envoy Dante Caputo urged international statesmen Monday to come to Haiti in 48 hours to protect lawmakers against political terror and salvage a rapidly unraveling plan for restoring democracy.

Caputo made the desperate appeal just five days before ousted President Jean Bertrand Aristide is scheduled to return under the terms of a U.N. peace plan.

Premier Robert Malval canceled a trip to Washington to meet Aristide because he did not want to raise expectations that Arlstide would return on time, Information Minister Herve Denis said. Malval met with Caputo and army commander Raoul Cedras, who led the coup against Aristide, on Monday.

Before Aristide returns, a U.N. plan calls for Haiti's parliament to pass laws putting the army's police division under civilian control and giving amnesty to military leaders. Lawmakers have been unable to reach a quorum.

Caputo hopes the presence of former world leaders would deter violence against lawmakers and allow passage of the legislation.

Pro Aristide lawmakers said they would not meet Tuesday because they feared for their safety.

"If people could kill the justice minister, which is unacceptable, why not kill a lot of parliamentarians? What would block them from killing me or anybody else?" pro Aristide Gen. Jacques Rony Mondestin said.

Justice Minister Guy Malary's death on Oct. 11 was the latest in a series of attacks on Aristide supporters since a U.N. plan to restore democracy was signed July 3.

Mondestin spoke after meeting Malval at his home.

Caputo's appeal to former world leaders is a desperate attempt to bring back Aristide, the country's first democratically elected president. The effort is supported by many Haitians but opposed by factions in the powerful military and tiny elite that have traditionally ruled this impoverished nation.

Last week, two pro-Aristide deputies went into hiding after receiving death threats, as other Aristide supporters and human rights officials have done.

In a television interview and crowded news conference, Caputo urged the statesmen to fly in quickly to serve as "witnesses to the world" and "moral protection" for legislators.

Among those invited were Jimmy Carter, Canada's Brian Mulroney, Argentina's Raul Alfonsin, Brazil's Jose Garney, Jamaica's Michael Manley and Julio Ganguinetti of Uruguay.

U.N. officials did not say if any had yet accepted, but Caputo urged their presence for parliamentary sessions this week.

No reservation requests had been made by midday Monday at the mountainside Hotel Montana where Caputo has his offices.

Carter's spokeswoman, Carrie Harmon, said the former president had not heard directly from the U.N. envoy or the United Nations.

A spokesman for Alfonsin said the former president would speak with Caputo, his former foreign minister, about the special envoy's request.

Sheltered kids to receive a special treat

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

Every year on Halloween children dress up in costumes to go from door to door collecting candy and goodies. Tonight a certain group of children won't need any tricks to get a very special treat.

The School Of Management has put together a student volunteer group, sources said, to give 50 children from shelters around the Amherst area a chance to dress up and participate in the fourth annual Halloween trick-or-treat.

Volunteers Initiating Blending Education and Service, the SOM sponsored group, said they will bus the children to Emerson and James dorms in Southwest for the event.

"This is a chance for these children to get a Halloween," said Amy Sullivan, a VIBES staff member.

According to Sullivan, the children come from The Main Street Shelter and Broderick House in Holyoke, Jessie's House in Northampton and the Family Recovery Program in Amherst. She said the children will go through the decorated dorms with a volunteer, and students will pass out candy.

"The list of student involvement has grown over the years," said Elisabeth Allen, a staff member. "The students enjoy this as much as the kids."

The organization began four years ago, Allen said, and has been sponsoring the Halloween program since then. According to Allen, the purpose of the organization is to provide students with volunteer information and support in their community service.

"It has always been a very successful program," Allen said.

U.S., Egypt call for peace talks

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton joined Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak yesterday in calling for Syria and Israel to resume peace talks, saying it was an important next step in the overall Middle East peace process.

"We have to keep going in this process until all the pieces are in place," Clinton said at a joint news conference with the Egyptian leader.

Mubarak, recently elected to his third term as president, said he was convinced that the gap between Israel and Syria "can be bridged within a short period of time."

Clinton praised Mubarak for playing "a crucial role in the Mideast peace process."

For his part, Mubarak said "the peace process was boosted dramatically" by the Sept. 13 accord between the PLO and Israel signed in Washington.

"It would have been impossible to realize this great achievement without an active American role," he said.

He invited Clinton to visit Egypt. Clinton said, with a laugh, that since he had just gotten the invitation, "I haven't worked out my schedule yet."

Both leaders stressed the importance of resuming talks between Syria and Israel. "There can't be a total peace in the Mideast unless there is some kind of peace with Syria," Clinton said.

On other subjects, Clinton:

Expressed disappointment with comments by leaders of Ukraine's parliament turning down a U.S. appeal to get rid of all the former Soviet republic's long range nuclear weapons and join the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

"We expect work to go forward" on the dismantling of the weapons as required by Cold War era treaties," Clinton said.

As the Nov. 17 house votes draws near, "you will see an enormous increase in my own personal efforts," he said.

Kuwait damaged by oil fires

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Oil well fires set by retreating Iraqis in the Gulf War have left a layer of soot across the desert that is encroaching on the region's roads and farms, scientists reported Monday.

The resulting erosion already has affected an area of 3,270 square miles, nearly one third of the surface of Kuwait, according to Farouk El Daz, director of the Center for Remote Sensing at Boston University.

"This is the first time in history that something like this has happened on this scale," said El Daz, who presented the findings to a meeting of the Geological Society of America.

"The result is vast amount of dust in the atmosphere, doubling the amount of dust storms per year and forming sand dunes that will continue to move around as long as there is wind — meaning forever."

El Daz and other scientists said the 1991 war left vast lakes of oil all over the desert, threatening the region's water supply. Liquid oil covers 20 square miles of Kuwait, they said.

But an even larger area is coated with an oil vapor that fell from burning wells and mixed with soot and sand to harden into a 4 inch thick covering the scientists call "tarcrete."

The substance kills all vegetation, freeing fine grained sand and dust. They, in turn, form sand dunes.

"The real danger is in the mobilization of the amount of sand on the desert's surface, where dunes have already formed in less than a year and continue to threaten roads and farms," said El Daz. "This is a huge area by any standard, and it is growing exponentially."

The researchers, whose work was paid for by the Kuwait Foundation for the Advancement of Science, recommended that gravel be spread atop the damaged sections of the desert, covering loose dust and sand.

Terrorists hijack Nigerian plane

Gunmen threatened arson if demands weren't met

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP) — Gunmen hijacked a Nigerian Airways jet carrying about 150 people just before it took off from Lagos yesterday. After flying to neighboring Niger, the hijackers freed 100 women, children and foreigners, an aviation official said.

The four hijackers said they would set the Airbus 310 on fire in 72 hours unless Nigerian authorities agreed to their demands, which included the resignation of Nigeria's military backed government, the Niger civil aviation official said.

He said the hijackers freed 100 people in Niger after negotiating with authorities. The plane reportedly had carried 137 passengers and 12 crew members.

Among the passengers were several Nigerian government officials, including the head of the Electoral Commission, Radio Nigeria reported. The report could not be independently confirmed.

Nigeria has been in a political uproar since the former ruler, Gen. Ibrahim Dabangida, nullified the June 12 presidential election that was to end a decade of military rule. Dabangida instead appointed a civilian supporter as his successor.

UMass takes second place in Resource Economics field

Resource economics is a field of economics that studies private and public decision making based on the food industry, the environmental sector and public utilities. Based on an analysis of articles published in the American Journal of Agricultural Economics, the program at the University of Massachusetts was ranked second in 1992.

UMass came ahead of schools like Illinois, Cornell and Michigan State, traditional leaders in the field. All together, 50 departments were ranked in the analysis. Two decades ago, UMass was not even ranked.

"We're very proud of our ranking," Cleve Willis, former chair of the department, said in a press release.

The older generation is more likely to pack up and travel

A recent study by a University of Massachusetts faculty member showed that the so-called "Silent Generation" are the biggest market for tourism these days.

The study, done by Rod Warnick of hotel, restaurant and travel administration, showed that while travel rates as a whole are in decline, the numbers for those over 65 have not fallen much at all.

Warnick's study looked at how much people travelled at a certain age. He also looked at the study by generations, trying to determine, which generation took the most trips.

Warnick also said that travel industry marketing should be targeted to the various age groups.

Nnaji heads to Nigeria

A reception was held last Friday at the Hotel Northampton to honor Bartholomew Nnaji, the current minister for science and technology in Nigeria.

Nnaji, who is on leave as professor of industrial engineering and operations research from the University of Massachusetts, was sworn into his post in August.

A native of Nigeria, Nnaji is also the founder of Geometric Machines Corp. He established the Automation and Robotics Lab for the industrial engineering department at UMass in 1984.

He is also the editor of the International Journal of Design and Manufacturing and the publisher of African World Magazine.

The reception was attended by Nnaji's family, friends and colleagues.

Resource economics fellowship set up

The resource economics department has set up and awarded its first Carolyn Harper Graduate Fellowship. The award was given to Juan-Camilo Cardenas, a graduate student from Colombia.

The award will be given to a graduate student who best exemplifies the qualities shown by Harper, a University faculty member who died last Februrary after an extended illness. The criteria include scholarly achievement, concern for social and environmental issues, and racial and gender justice.

Senators set up technical training

Senators John Kerry, D-Mass., and Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., announced small Massachusetts companies will soon have technical training to increase job creation in the state and to keep the nation's defense technology current.

Kennedy and Kerry have both been strong supporters of the University of Massachusetts' Center for Manufacturing Productivity and secured federal funding for its programs this year.

Civility commission holds forum

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Commission on Civility and Community Relations will hold a public forum tonight from 5:30 p.m. to 7 p.m. in the large activity room at the Bangs Community Center.

The Commission, formerly known as the Peace and Quiet Commission, will meet to clarify its mission for the 1993-94 academic year.

This year's Committee members are Joe Swartz, Paul Vasconcellos, a representative from the Dean of Students office; Tony Ong, and Michael Harris, president and vice-president of the Communter Area Government.

During the meeting the Commission will hear testimony from people to give the representatives a clearer picture of important issues this year. Ong is encouraging students to attend the meeting.

He said it would look bad for Amherst residents to be the only people in attendance.

Pointing this out, Ong made it clear that when this happens, the Commission only hears one side of the story.

"I would like to see a lot of students there to represent themselves," said Ong.

Matt Pavesi, the Student Government Association speaker, said he will suggest to the Commission to work on better student-town relations, especially regarding the town bylaws, which he feels are illegal and discriminatory toward UMass students.

Ong believes this Commission is just a start for a better relationship between Amherst and UMass.

He said a mutual respect between all involved would be a big step.

Contrary to popular opinion, Ong said, most residents and students do get along harmoniously.

It is just the minority, who are disrespectful and rowdy, that get all of the press.

The Commission was created about three years ago by the Amherst Select Board after townspeople became angry about all the noise and partying of UMass students.

The Commission would hear complaints and make recommendations to the Select Board.

No student representatives showed up at first. Many students believe this is why the noise and keg by-laws were passed. The Commission has been under fire for this with students claiming the by-laws are directly aimed at them and are discriminatory.

Last year students and residents clashed over the bar zoning laws.

Nature linked to homophobia

By Jamie D. Bearse
Collegian Staff

Kicking off the Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Association's awareness week, a social scientist from the Institute of Social Ecology discussed the reasons why a nature-hating society dislikes lesbians and gays last night.

Because natural law is created with the male as dominant and the female as submissive, queers are excluded from today's hierarchical society, scientist Chaia Heller said to her audience in Campus Center room 101.

"The way the planet is constructed, there's no room for me," she said. "We're extraterrestrials."

With the cycle of natural law, Heller said, there is another category that "can't be romanticized."

"Queers have always been viewed as outside of nature," Heller said. "We've been unnatural for years."

She said there is a "nature hating sacking order" created back during the transition of feudalism into capitalism, in which the straight White male turned "mother [Earth] into machine."

"We must look at our own oppression in relation to the ecological crisis," Heller said.

People look at "queers" as an urban product and an "antithesis of nature," she explained. Heller commented that "heterosexual sex is natural because it's part of natural law."

"Natural law is ridiculous," she said. "People, who conceived the idea of natural laws, believed it to be part of an unchangeable world and according to them. The only important thing for us to know is that we are part of an unchangeable world."

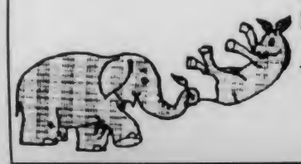
Despite attacking natural law, Heller said she kept an open mind throughout the forum.

"If the foundation of your house is faulty," she said, "then the windows of your house will give you an obscured view of the world."

She also encouraged people not to reinforce the law of nature on youngsters, but to help build them a foundation in which they can view the world freely from their own windows.

The awareness days continue tonight with a forum, "Bi the way, Is anyone listening? Racism, Gynophobia and Hetrosexism," conducted by Elias Farajaje-Jones, professor of the School of Divinity at Howard University, in the Student Ball Room at 8:00 p.m.

Farajaje-Jones will also give a brown bag talk on this Wednesday at noon on "Transgender of the Spirit - Queer Sexualities in Traditional Religious Cultures" in room 917 in the Campus Center.



The GLBA Office also encourages students to attend a self defense training class against homophobic violence presented by Janet Aalff and Rachel Broudy of the Valley Women's Martial Arts on Thursday at 3 p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center. I'm giving my oral presentation, and I've got the giggles

In seventh grade, the procedure of publicly hanging oneself, better known as the "oral presentation", plagued my life for the days which preceeded it. There, under the watchful eyes of the quite overbearing Spanish teacher Ms. Alpers, three of my classmates and I had our nooses fitted. We never received a fair trial. We were doomed from the start.

A key word or phrase could trigger uncontrollable hysteria in seventh grade — a contagious symptom of impatience and insecurity. It could not be counteracted or quelled.

The clever theme of our presentation was a simulated television interview between our designated Spanish talk show host and designated Spanish talk show guests (of which I was one). We had rehearsed our little charade, and prepared scripts. We actually had it down quite well. Our job (as was the job of any oral presentation) was supposedly to educate the class. Yet our one drawback was our ability to set into motion a chain-reaction of laughing when our host pronounced certain words in a silly voice. We thought we'd overcome this little problem.

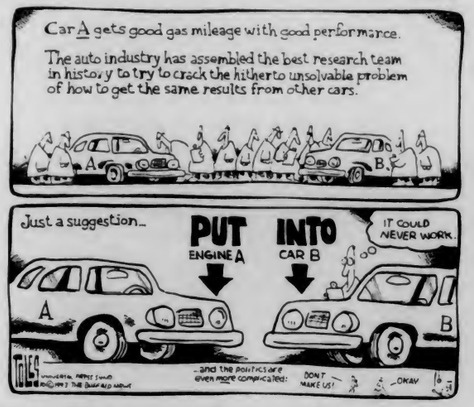
As we were seated in front of our antsy class, it became apparent that our talk show host had every intention of embarrassing us. Like clockwork, he assumed his voice as he asked me a question. One look in his mischievous eyes opened my floodgates of laughter. I tried desperately to read off my script, but my eyes were already too clouded with tears. Our report was sabotaged by the fact I made the rest of my group, and, for that matter, everyone else in the class, laugh. And why should I have known any better?

In elementary school, cursive writing was drilled to us as we continually would perfect the loops in our l's and the connecting of b's to other letters. Our tests and written work would then reflect our new found talents. While I've developed my own fractured writing style, I still call upon the same shapes and lines I was taught in first grade.

Adam
GOULSTON

We learned the virtues of structured writing, thanks to such tools, as the hamburger paragraph and outlines. We, then, were supposed to display what we'd learned in our essays and book reports. This didn't give me any trouble. Though I've pretty much abandoned the hamburger concept, I can now write in a structured and organized fashion, as is expected.

When we were not assigned writing, the dreaded oral presentation was levied. Dreaded because we were never taught how to stand comfortably in front of our peers, teacher and school. The oral equivalent of handwriting drills and cohesive outlines was nonexistant. With a red face and a stomach full of crawling bugs, we were booted into the deep end and forced to swim.



Thankfully, in college the cruelty and general futility of this concept has been abandoned. Uhhh. . . think again. The uncontrollable laughter has been replaced by "umms" and pretentious language. The nervous shifting of weight from foot to foot is now the fumbling through scores of note cards. It's embarrassing to watch.

Somewhere in time, an ambitious teacher theorized that if he or she placed the students in front of their classmates, it would not only give the teacher a chance to let someone else do the teaching, it would boost the students' self-esteem as well. What this revolutionary mind failed to take into account, however, was that the students were not as accustomed to standing in front of watchful eyes as the teacher.

My seventh grade Spanish fiasco, and more recently, my resonant fumbling of a metal pole in a concrete lecture hall, far outweigh any successes I've had in what is one of school's greatest potential opportunities to make an ass of oneself.

I don't know how to deliver an effective oral presentation for the same reason I don't know how to ask for a jelly donut or a box of Q-Tips in Paris — I was never taught. Rather I know Marcia Brady's little trick on envisioning the crowd in underwear, which no teacher ever publicly advocated. Yet I'm still called upon to teach in a fashion similar to that of a trained professional. And with hot face and twisted intestines, I dive in without the faintest idea how to float.

CIA affairs aren't exactly patriotic

Once again Michael Morrissey, delights us with another one of his controversial columns. Two weeks ago with his famous statements about AIDS and homosexuals and now with a "brilliant" column about the Peace Corps and the "world acclaimed" CIA. [Collegian, Oct. 21]

Mr. Morrissey, I have come to the conclusion that the lack of education found in both of your articles is something you should be worried about. I have no idea how a civilized and "educated" man can be brave enough to be proud of what he writes.

I understand you want to be a journalist. The best journalist is one who reports and informs the public about the truth, not one that lies like you did on the AIDS article. How did you come up with the courage to suggest that the heterosexual community is immune to the HIV virus?

Attention everyone! If you want to be a true patriot like George Bush, William Casey, Oliver North and Michael Morrisey, you better get a job on the CIA, and do it fast!

I understand that as a citizen of the United States you are very patriotic. But what I don't understand is how you can idealize such a pathetic institution. According to you, it insures "your liberty, your life, and the pursuit of happiness." Are you sure about that?

Are you informed that the invasion of Panama was another tactic the United States used to clean their reputation in the world? Well, if you educate yourself a little bit more, you will find out that Mr. Noriega was actually on the payroll of the CIA for many year before the invasion. You must know that Noriega was one of the most feared men in Panama, and the CIA knew about it.

What kind of agency pays such a man to work for them, and then puts up a Hollywood scene to bring him down? Now that's what you can call a good organization that knows how to work and use the tax payers' money. L e t me give you some advice: pray to God that he never takes away the luxuries and economic advantages you have right now. If I were you, I would never depreciate the sympathy and willingness a person might have to help another human being. Apparently, you don't know what it is like to go to bed week after week not having had anything to eat. You don't know what it is like to see a child crying because he doesn't have anything to keep him alive for one more day. Are you human, Mr. Morrissey?

And you say that the "Peace Corps don't pay." I am sorry, but for me they do. Because I have had something to eat, a place to eat and a wonderful family for the 20 years, my life has lasted. The mere satisfaction of feeding a hungry child and watching a human being smile for the first time in years, is not worth all the money, fame and glory in the world. Being thankful of what you have and expressing it by helping others, is something everyone should consider. I guarantee you all that it will pay.

The difficult shade of grey

"I'm sorry," he said, slumping in his grandpa-aged easy chair, as if cowering for forgiveness. "I'm sorry," he repeated. His forehead was glowing from the light hanging above him, but his halo was burning.

I looked at him not knowing whether his softness was sincere or just an emotion he had learned to create and capitalize on.

E.C.
THOMAS

"I know," I said, lying because in truth I didn't know. As I said it in the back of my mind I kept asking myself, "How many more times will I hear those two words?" Oddly enough, I've heard them more often than "How are you?"

As I get older, I'm finding it harder and harder to have faith in people. Maybe because a promise is no longer a promise, the truth is no longer the truth, or because relationships are no longer simply black and white. Men and women are progressively becoming a shade of grey that even Crayola hasn't developed.

Nothing's simple anymore. You have to have the definition, then comes the label, next you need to figure out the expectations, then the limits, then which X you should be afraid of and which one you should be jealous of.

Not just in traditional "relationships" but in friendships as well. Maybe because friendship between men and women has never really had a traditional place in society. This disturbs me.

Friendship is quite a simple thing. It's really not a hard concept to grasp. If you care about and trust someone, most likely they are your friend. However, men and women take on this seemingly easy relationship and next thing you know you need charts, graphs, markers and maps to even try to decipher what the hell is happening. Why?

I don't get it, never have and probably never will. My "friend" tells me I think too much about things like this. Seems to me he thinks too little. His definition of friendship is a recipe that calls for a cup or two of "I love you", a teaspoon of "you are so important to me" and then throw in a handful of "I'm sorry". And, you'll make it through the end of the semester, intact and unscathed.

Somehow, this doesn't work for me.

"I love you" and "I'm sorry" have become the most over used and empty phrases in the English language today. They're a safety net for the times you don't know what to say and an umbrella for the times you don't want to face what you know should. And as frightening as it may be, the outcome of people's relationships often depend on these two phrases.

For me, what's unsettling is that the two most important male relationships in my life are the ones I'm most worried about losing. Because I put the most energy and care — and yes — even love into them, one would think they'd be the easiest to deal with, the easiest to hold onto. Somehow, I've now found myself at that delicate point of not knowing whether I should just put an end to this confusion and hurt by saying "good-bye" or continue holding on with faith that in the end, it's all worth it.

I don't get it. Maybe Billy Crystal was right. Men and women can't be friends.

President Hooker's grand charade

I'd like to make a few observations and ask one basic question to whoever thought up the clever subhead ("Cynicism and mockery mark graduate demonstration") for the article about the GEO demonstration [Collegian, Oct. 15].

Since Michael Hooker has become president of this Univeristy system, he and the Trustees have increased tuition by four percent, taken two percent off the system budget to pay for Mission Enhancement proposals, given raises for his staff, increased his office's budget by 73.5 percent, and given chancellors of three UMass campuses raises of over $20,000 each. He is now creating additional upper-administration (read expensive) positions (who wants to pay for the new vice chancellor for economic development?). And he has asked academic departments to absorb additional cuts form their budgets to pay for these exciting new developments.

What this will mean for campus, if the rumors have any merit? Is among other things larger and fewer classes in the humanities and social sciences as soon as this spring? All of this from the now-highest-paid state employee, who during this entire time has been mouthing rhetoric about making our campus and this entire system more accessible, diverse and the "best University system in the country."

In the wake of all this, who do you think is the true cynic? Graduate students for pointing out these outrageous inequalities, or the man who perpetuated this entire self-serving charade in the first place all in the name of good appearances? Don't trash the messenger just because you don't like the message.

Is cloning ethical?

Groups argue over validity of procedure

By PAUL RESER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The cloning of human embryos by scientists at George Washington University raises ethical questions about genetic manipulation that neither science nor the government is ready to answer.

"The fact that there is a total moral vacuum in this whole area is now finally being realized," Cynthia Cohen, head of the National Advisory Board on Ethics and Reproduction, said Monday. Jeremy Rifkin, president of a biotechnology watchdog group, said the human cloning "represents a pernicious form of eugenics."

Cohen and other experts said there now are no clear, specific guidelines to control research on what some believe is a slippery slope on the edge of human experimentation.

The George Washington University researchers removed cells from a group of flawed human embryos and grew these cells into new embryos. Though this technique has been used in animal research, the experiment is thought to be the first using human embryos.

Though the cloning at George Washington did not involve embryos that could develop into a fully realized human, Cohen said the whole idea raised the "chilling" possibility of mass produced humans, or identical twins created at will for spare parts.

"Does this mean that our whole picture of what it means to be a human being is going to change into something that is manufactured?" she asked.

Rifkin's group, the Foundation on Economic Trends, threatened to file lawsuits if the National Institutes of Health did not stop all federal sponsorship of human embryo research.

"No such experiments should be allowed in the United States or funded by the U.S. government," said Rifkin.

Officials at the American Fertility Society said the George Washington University research by a team did not breech general voluntary guidelines on human embryo research now promoted by the AFS.

The ethics and reproduction panel, an independent board created by AFS and other biomedical organizations two years ago to consider such ethical questions, was caught off guard by the announcement over the weekend that human embryos had been cloned.

Burton's Nightmare a feast for the eyes

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

In the mind of Tim Burton, every Halloween is Christmas and every Christmas is Halloween. His visions are mixed marriages where merriment meets the macabre, where brooding dark knights seek love beyond the mask. In Burton's dreams, pristine blankets of white envelop Dickensian cemeteries and pumpkin kings long for seasonal warmth.

Tim Burton's The Nightmare Before Christmas is the creator's generous Christmas stocking to the mass populace that embraced his odd ball eccentricities in films Edward Scissorhands, Beetlejuice and most notably Batman. Stuffed to the brim with all things naughty and nice, it's a film that at once revels in its devilish wit while basking in heart-felt sentiment.

At the center of Nightmare is Jack Skellington, the Pumpkin King of Halloweentown. Having grown bored of the fright biz, Jack yearns for something to fill him inside. His hollow interior exhibited through his blank, vacuous eyes.

After stumbling upon Christmas and the warmth associated with that frosty holiday, Jack finds his true calling and sets in motion a hostile takeover of the yuletide. The problem is he just can't seem to get it right, and it isn't long before children are tucked all snug in their beds with visions of demons dancing in their heads.

Although the directorial reigns are passed on to fellow former Disney animator Henry Selick, Nightmare is clearly Burton's child. Selick may own the amazing stop-motion animation process but with its rogues' gallery of freakish characters (a literally two-faced mayor and a quartet of hockey playing vampires make fast friends) and its themes of alienation, Burton's touch is pervasive. It's always appeared that Burton's tortured loner characters were projections of his own personality and Jack Skellington is no exception.

A lanky, spindly skeleton with a pale pumpkin shaped head and a Gothic fashion sense, Skellington is at once the center of attention and a displaced independent. He returns triumphant from another Halloween raid on the suburban sanctity of the modern world, yet he still seeks love and friendship, not superficial scares.

As voiced by Chris Sarandon (Fright Night), Jack is a mournful ghoul in search of soul. Danny Elfman takes over Jack's voice in the narrative songs which truly propel the story. Elfman, one-time front man for the group Oingo Boingo, is a longtime Burton collaborator and composer of the film's ten original songs. It's his haunting voice that truly brings Jack to life, running from sorrow-laden soliloquies in the early refrains to wild bemusement as Jack marvels "What's this" at the sweet sights of Christmas Town. Suddenly his personal journey becomes that more urgent.

Perhaps the film's strongest character is Sally, a beat up rag doll whose stitchings are reminiscent of Frankenstein. Catherine O'Hara brings a quiet dignity to Sally, keeping her cautionary warnings as peripherals and shedding light on her own desires to be free of bondage. It's such a good vocal performance that it's easy to forget the vast stop-motion technology that brought her to life and see her as another great character gracing the silver screen. O'Hara's voice has such a subtle and hopeful quality that although the romance between Jack and Sally is kept aside, you can't help waiting for their moonlit serenade.

With two great characters it's too bad that the supporting puppet cast isn't as fleshed out. There's the wheelchair bound mad scientist (a great stab at Dr. Strangelove) and the three demented waifs, Lock, Shock and Barrel who entertain their thoughts of Santa's demise. A creature from a lime green lagoon talks about making "flesh crawl" and three bee-bop corpse musicians play on for the surrounding "bone daddies".

Much in the same way that Tim Burton is often successful at creating ceratin moods with his movies, composer Danny Elfman is equally proficient at creating a similar mood with his music. The team of Elfman and Burton is nothing new, however. The two created the image of an adult who never grew up in Pee Wee's Big Adventure and presented a world of darkness and mystery with Batman, and its sequel, Batman Returns.

The latest effort of Burton and Elfman, The Nightmare Before Christmas, successfully follows in the footsteps of it's predecessors. As far as Elfman's musical contribution to the movie,

Melodrama dampens fragile Mending Place

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

A Mending Place
Hampden Theatre
October 21, 1993

As the audience walked into Hampden Theater, a woman laid seemingly dead in the middle of the stage. Wire fencing, jagged and torn surrounded the stage. The floor was streaked white with paint, and the furniture, looking as if it were held together by a thread, was sparse.

The story of A Mending Place is about incest and it's aftermath. The main character, Anita, finds herself, as she awakens on the floor, in a new home — "a mending place" for incest survivors. Here she encounters Dr. Flowers, a good-hearted but inept therapist and Vivela, a floating catalyst for Anita's remembrance of her trauma.

She is later joined by her ever-in-denial and obnoxious sister, Sharin, with whom she has lost touch. Sharin's husband, Nick, also shows up. Nick is the man Anita hired to kill her father, the man who had been raping her.

Originally produced by Unseen Theater in Rockport, Massachusetts, A Mending Place, as written by Kyle Pedersen, has a good deal of dialogue which is symbolic and escapes the viewer. Although repetition of certain lines throughout the piece give it a Tennessee Williams-esque circularity, this repetition gets tedious.

On the whole the sentiment behind the acting was well thought-out, the characters of Anita and Sharin having to handle delicately balanced emotions as well as rapidity of movement. However, there are times where melodrama reigned — perhaps it was due to opening-night exuberance.

Director Mark P. O'Maley did an excellent job of handling overall artistic impression, this play being particularly difficult to stage as it takes place in a single room. A Mending Place ends rather abruptly, with Anita and Nick leaving no answer to the main questions of the play. Who is guilty or not guilty of killing an incest perpetrator? What is left for the victim, and who is to decide Anita's "therapy"?

Virtual reality to be captured in CCA

BY JEFF COKER
Collegian Staff

Steve Ditlea, a science journalist and virtual reality expert, will be showcasing Tuesday evening an exclusive lecture and video presentation on "Virtual Reality: Where Fantasy and Reality Meet," at the Campus Center Auditorium. The event is sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Ditlea, a free-lance journalist for 20 years, has spent much of his career reporting on science and technology, thus enhancing his personal virtual reality archives to be the most extensive in the world.

Virtual reality figures have been demonstrated in the film Lawnmower Man, based on a short story by Stephen King, and are of the utmost advanced computer technologies currently in the works and licensing.

The virtual reality user is a subject of the most technologically enhancing illusions and "electronic LSD" hallucinatory-like feelings, which allow the individual to control their own world of both fantasy and reality.

With virtual reality, the user can reach out and pull apart atoms or jump into a whole new galaxy, walk through walls or guide his or her hand through another body in an instance. The illusory world is a fascinating dream come true changing fantasy to fact.

The Distinguished Visitors Program is a non-profit student organization that brings prominent speakers to the University of Massachusetts to lecture in all areas from politics and humanities to science and the arts.

Steve Ditlea will present "Virtual Reality: Where Fantasy and Reality Meet" Tuesday, Oct. 26 at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The lecture and presentation is free and open to everyone.

Irish folk maverick Makem to play the Horse

By EDWARD HURLEY
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday, Oct. 26, fans of Irish folk music will find a treat at the Iron Horse — singer Tommy Makem will perform. Makem is a legend in the Irish folk music circles. He has been described as the "dean of Irish folk" music.

If you ask someone to name an Irish group, some would say U2. But a lot of people would say the Clancy Brothers. Tommy Makem played with the Clancys for many years, as well as doing a lot of duet work with Liam Clancy of the Clancy Brothers. Makem teamed up with the Clancys last year at the Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert at Madison Square Garden, where he and the Clancys delivered a haunting rendition of Dylan's "When The Ship Comes In".

Tommy Makem is an accomplished ongwriter, as well as, being a talented performer. He has penned such folk standards as "Four Green Fields," "Gentle Annie," "The Rambles of Spring," "The Boys of Killybegs" and "Farewell to Carlingford".

He is a successful actor as well. Makem has worked in several television series including two for Scotish television, one for BBC Belfast, a syndicated show for Canadian television and even a show for CBS here in America. He has also done work in off-Broadway plays and summer stock productions.

Tommy Makem's first big break was when he played the world renowned Newport Folk Festival in 1961, where he and legendary songstress Joan Baez were heralded as the most promising newcomers on the folk music scene. After this, he was in much demand as a singer, as well as an actor. Makem toured extensively around the world with the Clancy Brothers playing to sold-out audiences.

In 1975, Makem teamed up with Liam Clancy to start a 13 year duo career. There were more sold-out tours, records and television programs, including one for New Hampshire Public Television which earned him an Emmy nomination.

Tommy Makem is a magical performer armed with his banjo, his tin whistle, his baritone voice and his strong sense of showmanship. His concert at the Iron Horse will be a treat for new fans as well as old. Come to the Iron Horse to spend a magical evening with the dean of Irish folk music, Tommy Makem.

Tommy Makem will play Iron Horse on Oct. 26 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $14.50 and available through the Northampton Box Office.

The trade embargo is hurting the Cuban people not Fidel Castro

The United States and independent Cuba

By Professor Paul Dosal
Special to the Collegian

In July 1953 Fidel Castro launched the Cuban revolution with a disastrous attack against the Moncada army barracks in eastern Cuba.

At his trial, the 27-year-old lawyer turned humiliating defeat into victory with a brilliant and passionate self-defense. While he admitted to conspiring to overthrow the government he argued that it was the duty of any citizen to overthrow a tyrannical government.

He invoke the examples of the English, French and American revolutions and cited Locke, Rousseau, Paine and the apostle of Cuban liberty, Jose Marti. Castro concluded his arguments with words later immortalized by revolutionary propagandists: "Condemn me. It does not matter. History will absolve me."

Analysis
By Paul Dosal

With Castro's regime facing imminent collapse, Americans might like to believe that history has proven Castro wrong. Admitting that the conditions are not ripe for the construction of socialism, Castro has lifted restrictions on the circulation of the dollar, authorized the operation of some private companies, offered attractive terms to foreign investors, and opened 100 trades and services to individual private enterprise. Castro has repeatedly indicated his willingness to restore full diplomatic relations with the United States and negotiate an end to the American trade embargo. To American observers, these limited steps toward capitalism suggest that Castro is abandoning communism and embracing North American style democracy and free enterprise.

While it is certainly time for Castro to abandon the policies that have led to the miserable conditions on the island, it is also time for the United States to renounce its right to intervene in Cuba's internal affairs. Americans have tried to control the destiny of Cuba since the early 19th century, believing that it would,gravitate naturally into their empire. The United States intervened in Cuba's war for independence in 1898 and occupied the island until 1902. Between 1902 and 1933, Cuba was a U.S. dependency. From 1933 to 1958, Democratic and Republican presidents supported a series of corrupt and repressive regimes because they served American economic and strategic interests.

When Fulgencio Batista assumed dictatorial powers in 1952, the United States did not oppose him. For the next six years, Americans partied at Havana nightclubs while Castro's rebel army fought an army trained and equipped by the United States.

The triumph of the Cuban revolution in 1959 completed a war for independence that began In 1868. While Americans would like to believe that Castro broke off a friendly relationship with the United States, no president has ever respected Cuba's right to self determination. Castro and the Cuban revolutionaries won that right at the Bay of Pigs, but the United States has never admitted its defeat nor has it repudiated its interventionist policies. In the 34 years since the triumph of the Cuban revolution, American policy has been based on the paradoxical assumptions that Castro does not exist but he must be eliminated. The United States refuses to extend diplomatic relations to Cuba and prohibits Americans from trading with or travelling to the island, while the CIA has conspired with mercenaries and assassins to eliminate Castro, even trying the old exploding cigar trick, a tactic that works only on Bugs Bunny.

Clinton has expressed some interest in modifying American policy, but when he recently renewed the 34-year-old embargo, he revealed that he remains subservient to the rabid Cuban-exile lobby and a captive of the American interest in strangling the revolution. Like every president since Eisenhower, he demands the unconditional surrender of Castro and the Cuban people. By maintaining the trade embargo and refusing to negotiate with the Cuban government, Clinton has demonstrated that he is committed to the interventionist policies that fueled the Cuban revolution in the 1950s.

At issue in the future of Cuba is the right of self-determination. Castro has earned the respect of Latin Americans for defeating the Yankee invaders and asserting Cuba's national identity. Having achieved their independence at the cost of great personal sacrifices, Cubans will never again tolerate American intervention in their internal affairs. So while we wait for the Cubans to reject communism, they are waiting for us to recognize their right to self determination. Americans are eager to deal with a post-communist Cuba but are we prepared to deal with an independent Cuba? Puerto Rico? Panama? The renewal of the trade embargo reveals that Clinton has not repudiated the interventionist policies that have infuriated Cuban nationalists since 1898. Condemn Castro's policies if you will, but history will absolve him for overthrowing a brutal regime propped up by American imperialism. Will history absolve the United States for obstructing Cuba's nationalistic aspirations?

Our own Latin America

In One Hundred Years of Solitude, Gabriel Garcia Marquez created a world where fantasy and tradition combine, a world where everything is possible and yet nothing is perfect. This is the nature of Latin America.

In the eyes of the developed world, Latin America is a paradise for disaster and corruption. The stories that you find in the press about Latin America (and all of the developing world) are quite amazing.

Juan Jose
CHACON QUIROS

Who can picture Colombia and Bolivia in the United States without thinking about cocaine and drug lords? Have you ever seen a picture of Latin America where people are not poor, dirty or in need? Do all Mexicans wear sombreros on a daily basis?

These questions might seem ridiculous but to a U.S. citizen they are not far from reality. What happens when these same people are told by their government that Nicaraguans are unable to govern themselves? The fact is that in this country people believe they are the heart and soul of the world, and they have the moral task of controlling the violent masses of "savages" that abound in the world. Scholars call this "manifest destiny."

For Latin Americans, it is difficult to understand why the majority of the U.S. people laugh and praise armed interventions. U.S. soldiers, most of them belonging to the lower class, intervene and suppress a movement that is trying to obtain the same fundamental rights (education, health, minimum wages, freedom of speech and life) that their own ancestors fought for. Is this something to laugh or brag about?

The U.S. government has intervened in the internal affairs of the Latin America for more than a century. How would the common "kick ass" North American understand that we don't want the C.I.A. deciding who's going to be the our next president? It seems like common sense but our struggle is not against the United States. Our struggle is for equality and independence from any foreign power.

Today, I want you to look at the pictures at the bottom of the page. These people have demonstrated to what extent Latin Americans can go. Look at them and keep them in your mind. Find about them. Read their books. They show a Latin America where people fight for their rights and, unlike the United States, a place where people do not take freedom for granted. Latin Americans are wonderful people, eager to smile and to scream they are not afraid to touch.

Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Rigoberta Menchu and Octavio Paz are part of the cultural and political legacy of Latin America, a legacy that the United States governemnt has tried to destroy in the past. In the words of Octavio Paz "if culture is weak it will die, if it's strong nobody will be able to take it away."

It might seem the Latin American crisis is over for good but remember the marines arrived long before the Bolsheviks. Gabriel's "100 years of solitude" could depict 100 years of U.S. intervention.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Steer clear of conflict this morning; do not force an issue you know is inflammatory. Put romance on the back burner while you concentrate on job aims. Nurture your friendships.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Domestic considerations could temper your eager pursuit of career objectives, especially if travel is involved. Guard against making any professional or personal commitments in haste.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Material possessions, including cash assets, need careful handling. Catching up with the bills is also critical. Consult experts — a budget revision may help relieve financial stress.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You make an excellent impression on influential people. A power lunch could be the setting for one of your most triumphant financial deals. Give a friend a necklace.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Opportunity has monetary overtones today. A well-meaning friend may try to convince you to take unnecessary chances. VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Be careful not to overtax your strength this morning. You will want to be in top shape later today. Be responsive to positive influences.

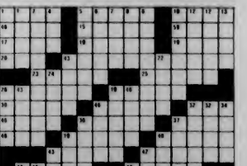
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Job advancement remains a top priority. Be careful not to neglect your personal obligations.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Friction regarding joint finds may arise early today. Clarify your concerns. Although your perceptions are usually right on the mark, a thoughtful gift or generous gesture changes your mind about someone.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Take advantage of current favorable trends to promote important goals and personal interests. Valuable support comes from someone who prefers to work behind the scenes.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Mixed reaction does not look promising for business travel. Finish up ongoing projects before launching new ones.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Early morning contact with a lawyer or someone at a distance could prove disappointing. Deception is possible. The evening favors romance and socializing.



PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Your co-workers could prove to be valuable allies today. Let them know that their loyalty will be rewarded. Tonight, a partner's decision could provide a favorable follow-up for earlier plans.

the work he did for Batman and Pee Wee is eclipsed.

Since The Nightmare Before Christmas is a musical, Elfman was called upon not only to compose fitting music, but also to write pertinent lyrics that would carry much of the movie's story. Of the Album's 20 tracks, 10 of them are fully worded, with lyrics also provided by Elfam.

Elfman has created a sound track that is strong enough to stand on its own. Even without the movie, the interplay between the characters in the songs is enough to base a live staged musical on.

Some of the better material on the album occurs as a result of the interplay between the characters of Lock, Shock and Barrel, the three ghouls commissioned to kidnap Sandy Claws. The three plan such ghastly acts as "Kidnap the Sandy Claws/Throw him in a box/Bury him for ninety years/Then see if he talks," or "Take a cannon/Aim it at his door/Ad knock three times/And when he answers/Sandy Claws will be no more."

The love relationship between the story's main character, Jack, and his admirer Sally is also further explored in the music, a well as the journey Jack makes within himself.

All in all, The Nightmare Before Christmas is a great trip Into the world of non-serious, American musicals. Both satisfying musically and fun to listen to, the sound track to Nightmare Before Christmas and the movie that accompanies it are a great combination. B+

Unfortunately, these characters never become more than the wooden technological achievements they are. They are a marvel to look at but they don't stay memorable.

Still that's a minor fault for a film that seeks beyond the cold confines of technological wonder for a more intrinsic dose of heart. Audiences will thrill to the amazing effects and the spectacular production design (Halloweentown is a cobwebbed wonderland mixing Charles Addams' Gothic with schoolboy Grossout) but it's the creator's noble message that carries the film.

Jack Skellington goes looking for heart and finds it in Tim Burton's soul. B+ (Hampshire Six)

Women's X-C places second

By JONATHAN GANGI
Collegian Staff

It is tough for a team to succeed when one of its best players gets hurt. But if injury strikes three critical team members, tough becomes impossible.

The University of Massachusetts women's cross-country team, however, almost accomplished the impossible on Saturday, as it placed second in the Atlantic 10 Championships. Being in the unlikely position of having three top runners either injured or sick, the Minutewomen "showed their depth and strength," said Coach Julie LaFreniere, by finishing behind only St. Joseph's.

Last year in the A-10s , twin co-captains Kelly and Kim Liljeblad finished second and fifth. This year a painful hip-flexer held Kelly to 19th and possible bone chips in Kim's ankle kept her at 21st. Junior Kristin Diggs, who had been running well despite an iron deficiency, was finally overcome with exhaustion and finished 23rd.

As usual, freshman Melissa Langevin ran hard and was the first Minutewoman to cross the finish line. Langevin placed 7th in a field of 66 and narrowly missed becoming the A-10 Freshman of the Year. Unfortunately, she was outrun by a woman, whom she beat just two weeks ago.

Sophomore Jen Waeger was one of the Minutewomen who "pulled together," said LaFreniere, finishing second for UMass and 10th overall.

LaFreniere also said she was "just amazed" by the performances of Waeger and Kerri Aker, who placed third for the women and 18th overall.

All 12 Massachusetts runners crossed the line in the top half of the field. Freshman Katie Grenia and junior Julie Moreau were among those who stepped up, running fourth and fifth respectively for the squad. St. Joe's had five of the top thirteen finishers, including winner Vicki Boyer, and scored 41 points en route to the championship. UMass followed with 68 points and West Virginia placed third with 72.

pretty sound so far. The Leafs have won nine straight games to open the season, breaking an NHL record set by the 1974 Buffalo Sabres.

The sound play of the Maple Leaf defense and the always spectacular play of second-year goalie Felix Potvin have been keys to the early success.

While the Maple Leafs were expected to be strong, the surprise of the season has been the 7-0 start of the New Jersey Devils. The return to a defensive style of play instituted by new Coach Jacques Lemaire has been crucial to their success. Their winning ways will be tested when the Devils take to the road for a match up with defending champion Montreal.

The story of Manon Rheaume has taken an embarrassing turn. What once was an inspiring story has turned sour. During the 1992-93 pre-season, Rheaume became the first woman to play in an NHL game. She was shelled giving up two goals on nine shots and looked bad on both goals.

When it became apparent that she was not an NHL caliber goalie, instead of releasing her like they would any other player who wasn't up to par, Lightning owner Phil Esposito has turned her into a side show. She does not even play regularly for the farm team Atlanta Knights. Playing poorly on the ice but looking pretty off it has become her career.

Rheaume has not helped her image as an athlete either, dressing in a leather jacket and a miniskirt in advertisements for hockey equipment, and her pretty face not her goaltending skills are featured in her commercials with Starter. It's time for Rheaume to retire from the NHL with what's left of her dignity.

• As if there weren't enough reasons to degrade the expansion Anaheim Mighty Ducks. USA Today reported that in a effort to eliminate excuses for their poor play, players are forbidden to refer to the club as an "expansion team," risking fines. Rumor has it that players are also discouraged from using the phrases "embarrassment to the league" and "ridiculous mascot" as well.

• Closer to home, hockey has made its long awaited return to the University of Massachusetts. Although Coach Joe Mallen's squad played the sacrificial lamb to a tough Merrimack team in its opener, the Minutemen could prove to be fairly competitive against the combined Division 2 and 3 schedule that they will play during their opening campaign which begins Saturday night, when they take take on Villanova.

Although he believes his team is young, It should be able to implement what it has learned since September, O'Brien said.

"We didn't move up a notch," he said. "We fell short in the psychological edge.

"This experience is a clear illustration to the team as to what they have to do," said O'Brien, who believes his team needs to reach down a little harder and take the next few days to mentally and physically prepare for Friday's meet.

"I've had teams in the past who have done this," he said. "We need two or four guys to take it by the scruff of the neck."

The Minutemen will take part in the New England Championships at Boston this Friday.

Women's tennis ends up in fourth at NE's

By DAVE COPELAND
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team tied for fourth place with the University of Hartford at the New England Championships this past weekend. The Minutewomen were once again led by number one singles player, Liesl Sitton, who finished second to Hope McAndrew of Boston College. Sitton lost in the finals to McAndrew, 6-3, 6-0.

"She [Sitton] played superb tennis this weekend," Coach Judy Dixon said. "There wasn't much difference between her and her opponent, ability wise."

Dixon said she felt Sitton's troubles stemmed from the fact her opponent was mentally tougher.

"BC plays a much tougher schedule than we do. McAndrew is used to playing three tough matches a week, where Liesl is used to winning 6-0 and 6-0."

The Minutewomen also had a fine performance from freshman Liz Durant, who finished fifth at number two singles. Durant demonstrated her ability by playing a smart, tactical game.

Ana DeCheke and Kathy Schmidt rounded out the Minutewomen's singles players, each finishing sixth. Pam Levine and Stacey Schekner combined for a fifth place finish at number one doubles, and Lesley Watts teamed with Mary Edwards to finish fifth at number two doubles.

On the whole, Dixon said she was pleased with her team's overall performance.

"We finished right where you would expect us to. There were no surprises."

This weekend, the Minutewomen send four players to the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's Rolex Championships at the University of Pennsylvania. Sitton will represent UMass amongst the field of 32 schools at singles, and Scheckner and Levine will play for UMass in the doubles tournament.

Coach Dixon, hoping for her young player to make the overall draw, has also entered Liz Durant into a qualifying round.

"This is going to be a great opportunity for these players to see where they stand," Dixon said. "Right now, Liesl is one of the ten best players in New England, and this will give her a chance to see how she rates nationally." Dixon also added that Sitton may be one of the best players the UMass tennis program has ever seen.

The Rolex Championships is the final event in the Minutewomen's fall season. The team resumes play next spring.

"consistent security" than the NATO.

When Wilkins went down with a hamstring injury early this month, it was Trunk, along with Kocher, who stepped up their play.

"When Paula was out, she placed a much greater demand on herself and the players around her," Rudy said. "She became a leader out there, and with Heidi, just took control of the defense. She took her play to a new level."

So as Trunk plays her final regular season collegiate game today, at Vermont, 2 p.m., she will likely turn in another solid performance, that few besides her teammates will immediately value.

When her collegiate career ends sometime next month, she will not be named All-American or maybe even All-Atlantic 10. Although she undoubtedly deserves the All-Conference honor, she will have earned the respect of her teammates and her coach and a few fans, who need no plaques to become a believer.

The winner of the UMass versus MIT game will face Harvard University or Army. The victor of that set will most likely face Brown University, the strongest entry other than UMass in the New England region.

Just two weekends ago, the Minutemen disposed of Brown in dramatic fashion at Amherst College, 10-9.

The 16-team field within the Easterns will be narrowed down to two, and ultimately a winner be decided. The winner is automatically ensured a NCAA berth.

"We're where we need to be," said Yarworth. "It's pretty clear to the guys what they have to do the rest of the way to go to the [NCAAs]. They just said yesterday, that's where they want to go."

The NCAA tournament takes place the weekend following Thanksgiving Day in Long Beach, California.

UMass and ESPN building a tradition

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

Over two years ago, a bond was formed between the University of Massachusetts Men's Basketball Program and ESPN. The date was February 1, 1991, and the site was the Curry Hicks Cage.

For the first time ever, the Minutemen were on national television during the regular season; well, sort of. Massachusetts Coach John Calipari accepted a proposal by the Total Sports Network to play intra-state rival Boston University at midnight just so his program could make advances toward being on television.

"It's important to the program, and it's the first step," Calipari said at the time. "When ESPN leaves here, I want them to say 'Wow, they've got a good, clean crowd.' Then we'll get more games during regular hours."

Fast-forward to the present, and usher in this Friday night at midnight, when the William D. Mullins Center will host its first-ever Midnight Madness. And like clockwork, with the Minutemen on at the bewitching hour, ESPN is not far behind.

It will be a first-of-its-kind event, as the Minutemen along with North Carolina and Kentucky hold their first practice in front of the nation.

UMass has found a late night home on ESPN, winning the BU contest in its debut and then two more midnight games against Siena College and Southwestern Louisiana the past two seasons. But now, according to Calipari, it is not just the team in the spotlight. It is the fans that will be asked to step up to the likes of the Tar Heels and the Wildcats.

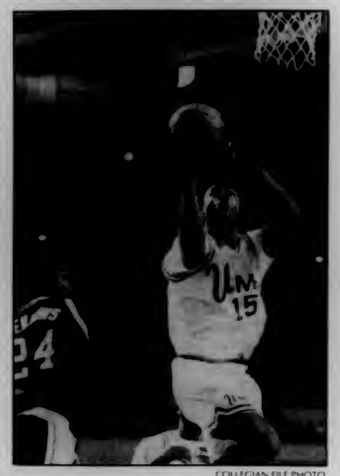
"One of the reasons our midnight games work so well on ESPN is our fans and the way they have acted," said Calipari. "For the BU game, the crowd was wild. People were wrapped in American flags [during the Persian Gulf War].

"The Last Game in the Cage was one of the best ever for ESPN, mainly because of our fans. Everyone had the same T-shirts on, they were all standing. It set us apart."

Calipari said he was in Italy over the summer and a tourist approached him about his "Final Rage" T-shirt which promoted both UMass and ESPN that he was wearing. The man said that he was an instant fan of Minuteman basketball.

"Everywhere I go, if I'm wearing a T-shirt with UMass and ESPN on it, people comment on how great the last game in the Cage was and how unbelievable our fans are," Calipari said.

The team has been selling special Midnight Madness/UMass basketball/ESPN T-shirts this season in the Campus Center Concourse, and Calipari said that he hopes the fans will wear the tees as they have in the past.



"I want people tuning in to say 'Carolina has great fans, Kentucky has great fans, but how about that UMass crowd? They were something.' That is the type of thing that will set us apart."

ESPN College Basketball Analyst Bill Raftery will be the master of ceremonies for the festivities, which will include the introduction of former UMass players, a three-point shootout between the Minutemen and Kentucky, a slam-dunk contest, and some special surprises, according to Calipari.

Two players from UMass' run to the 1992 NCAA Sweet Sixteen, guard Anton Brown and forward Will Herndon, among others that Calipari has coached, are scheduled to make an appearance in Mullins for the Madness.

All of the tickets for the event are gone, but Calipari said it doesn't mean the arena will be filled.

"The tickets are gone, but the point is to fill every seat. They could have picked any school in the country to go along with North Carolina and Kentucky, but they picked us," said Calipari. "This is something special, and I hope our fans realize the importance of packing the place for ESPN."

Gretzky still the Great One

BETWEEN THE PIPES Matt Vautour on the NHL

Just when you thought he was on the downside of his career, Wayne Gretzky has returned to the form that has made him arguably the best player to ever lace up a pair of skates.

During the off season there was speculation the Great One might call it a career after he led the upstart Kings to the Stanley Cup Finals last season, but he claimed he still had some fire for the game left.

That fire has been evident so far this season. In only 10 games, Gretzky has seven goals and 17 assists for a league-leading 24 points, far ahead of his closest competitor (Sergei Federov) who has only 16.

The NHL might still be Wayne's World for some time in the future.

Trunk an un-heralded treasure

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Before the season began for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, friends of senior Paula Wilkins constructed a sign in the fencing above Richard F. Garber Field which reads, "We Believe."

It was meant to express the fact that Wilkins' friends believed that despite the lack of pre-season All-American's on the roster, UMass' un-heralded players would lead the team to the NCAA Tournament for the 11th time in 12 seasons.

The Minutewomen are now 12-2-3 and tied with Wisconsin-Madison as the No. 5 ranked squad nationally. And while this season may be the first since 1980 that Massachusetts does not have an All-American, the believers are being proved correct by their somewhat un-heralded team.

One of the players the sign certainly was meant for was wing-defender senior Amy Trunk, who may be the quietest of the quiet, but extremely talented, Massachusetts defensive corps.

Where Wilkins and fellow back Heidi Kocher do not garner the national acclaim they deserve, Trunk is often overlooked on campus. If you watch a Minutewomen game, you might not notice her, because the senior from Farmington, Mich., does little which immediately makes her stand out.

Trunk is the antithesis baseball's Bo Jackson. Jackson is called the "Big Moment," because whatever he does, whether positive or negative, is big. When Bo strikes out, everyone knows.

Trunk does not make many mistakes and her positives, described by UMass Coach Jim Rudy as, "Quiet confidence and consistent security," are difficult to fit into headlines. She has two career goals, but her impact on the Massachusetts program has been invaluable.

"She has added quite a lot to this team over the last four years," Rudy said. "She is just a good, solid player. On the field she is a very good defender. She is level-headed and doesn't get panicked."

Trunk for three season's played at midfield, but was moved back this season because Rudy implemented a new zone defensive system. And with a load of new faces seeing considerable playing time, he wanted some experience at defense.

"Her play has blossomed since we moved her back," Rudy said. "She has been making more attacking runs from defender than she ever made at midfield.

"I knew I could move her back because she was such a steady midfielder, a great defender," Rudy said. "Her play was never a factor in getting a goal."

Over four seasons, Rudy said he can not remember a single goal in which a Trunk error caused. That's a more

Water polo gunning an NCAA tourney bid

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

Before they started to practice in a pool, before they really gelled as a team and before they knew Tasan Engin would be healthy enough to endure an 18-game regular season, the University of Massachusetts water polo team set one premier goal.

To earn a berth in the NCAA tournament.

After a successful 15-3 regular season campaign, the road to that goal begins this weekend at Brown for Russ Yarworth's squad.

Overall in the sport of water polo, the NCAA splits the United States into two regions, East and West. There are eight teams that reach the NCAA tournament.

The NCAA reserves two spots in the tournament for winners of the eastern and western brackets. Another spot is reserved for the winner within the Mountain Pacific Sports Federation tournament. The remaining five spots are selected at large by the NCAA, according to Tom Jacobs of the NCAA.

UMass is part of the eastern region. Within the eastern region, there are four divisions: New York, New England, Central and Atlantic. The top four teams in each individual division head to Arkansas for the Easterns.

UMass is in the New England region and will face off against Massachusetts Institute of Technology on Saturday. A win in that contest ensures a berth in the easterns the following weekend for the Minutemen. From that point on, it's all a jockeying game for a high seed in the Easterns.

Men meet expectations

Cross country finishes third at A-10s

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team made the trip down to Washington, D.C., for the Atlantic-10 Championships on Saturday and came home with a third place finish.

West Virginia won the A-10 Championship with a team score of 24. St. Joseph's finished second with 55 points followed by the Minutemen with 72 points. George Washington placed fourth and Duquesne finished fifth.

"I'm not surprised we were third," said Coach Ken O'Brien, who had expected his team to finish either second or third.

UMass was able to claim third place overall by taking the 12th through 15th positions. Ethan Nedeau led the Minutemen once again, placing 12th in a time of 27:49.42. Matthew Behl finished second for UMass with a time 27:50.24.

Kevin Greenhalgh placed 14th in 27:54.04 and Jonathan Way completed the UMass quartet finishing 15th in 27:56.87. Ted Towse rounded out the top five for the Minutemen with an 18th place finish in 28:12.03.

Despite the team's third place finish, O'Brien felt some level of disappointment in the race.

"I felt as though 50 percent of the team didn't attack the race with the confidence that we should be doing," O'Brien said.

Health care bill billions short of aim

By CHRISTOPHER CONNELL
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton's health reform proposal will fall $30 billion short of the budget savings predicted earlier, an administration official said Tuesday as the White House readied the plan for delivery to Congress.

The President and Hillary Rodham Clinton were due to bring the 1,600-page bill to Congress in person today in a ceremony in Statuary Hall.

Clinton has argued that without a sharp slowdown in health inflation, the federal deficit would spiral back up later in this decade.

His economic advisers had vowed to sacrifice further deficit reduction before raising taxes any more for health reform.

In the original draft, Clinton's health plan would have lowered the deficit by $91 billion between now and the year 2000.

Dr. Philip R. Lee, the assistant secretary for health, told a medical educators' meeting the deficit reduction figure now is "around $60 billion."

Other administration officials said the revised plan will offer discounted coverage to some small businesses with as many as 75 workers. The cutoff had been 50 workers in the original plan.

And a government takeover of employers' costs of providing health benefits for early retirees ages 55 to 64 will be phased in slowly between 1998 and 2001, said the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The White House has backed down from an ambitious goal to reserve half of all residencies for doctors training in primary care within five years.

Instead, it would set a goal of having 55 percent of the residents in primary care by the year 2002. Seventy percent of the 625,000 U.S. doctors now are specialists.

Clinton said Tuesday he was not willing to water down his health reform plan in the face of criticism from the National Association of Manufacturers that he was promising Americans too much.

"Most manufacturers are going to save money on this. If they want to look a gift horse in the mouth, that can be their decision," the president said.

Leon Panetta, the White House budget director, said Clinton had taken pains to avoid creating new "open ended entitlements" in health care, "particularly when we're trying to discipline the rest of government spending."

Panetta said Clinton has built in a mechanism to cap the entitlements.

Some lawmakers have voiced fears that Clinton was concentrating too much power in the hands of an independent National Health Board and the regional alliances that would form a new insurance buying marketplace.

Missing person search ends

Remains found in woods confirmed as Piirainen's

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Investigators said Tuesday they have confirmed remains found in the Brimfield woods are those of Holly Piirainen, a 10-year-old Grafton girl missing for the past 2-and-a-half months.

But State Police Sgt. Joseph Howley said the cause of death has not been determined.

"Further forensic tests are under way, but it probably will take some time before they are completed," Howley said.

"Investigators assigned to the case are combing the area and the forensic and lab people are out there as well. We are actively seeking an end to this."

Two hunters discovered the skeletal remains Saturday in the isolated woods off a dirt road about five miles from where the little girl disappeared during a visit to her grandparents' cottage in Sturbridge.

She was last seen Aug. 5, walking down a secluded road to see a litter of puppies. The only trace left behind was a lone sneaker in the middle of the road.

Her disappearance touched the hearts of hundreds of people, who joined police and the family in combing the woods immediately reached for comment, but Richard Piirainen, the girl's father had said they had been convinced the remains were those of Holly because police found the sneaker and the clothes she was wearing. He said investigators told him it would be at least two weeks before the body would be released for burial.

Hampden County District Attorney William Bennett announced the identification of the body in a three paragraph statement. He urged anyone with information about the case to call State Police in Sturbridge.

Bennett refused to release any further information about the investigation and declined to return repeated telephone calls.

Hampden County Medical Examiner Loren Mednick also could not be reached, and Dr. Richard Evans, the state's chief medical examiner did not return repeated telephone calls.

Oil embargo in Haiti yielding violence, crises for Parliament

By DAVID BEARD
Associated Press

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — Gun-toting men barged past waiting motorists to commandeer dwindling gasoline supplies Tuesday, as a global oil embargo aimed at restoring democracy squeezed Haiti harder.

Parliament was again unable to muster a quorum to pass laws that could end the crisis. Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras, head of the military that toppled President Jean Bertrand Aristide in 1991, wants the parliament to grant an amnesty to those involved in murders since the coup.

Many legislators are in hiding at home or abroad, afraid that anti-Aristide thugs will kill them if they appear in public.

Political violence blamed on the ruling military, as well as the military's intransigence, has hampered efforts to bring Aristide home under a U.N.-brokered accord signed in July.

Under the agreement signed by Cedras and Aristide, the military chief was to have resigned last week, while Aristide, the country's first freely elected leader, is to return Saturday.

The United Nations imposed the oil and arms embargo Oct. 18, after Cedras showed growing unwillingness to step down and military-backed workers turned back a U.S. ship carrying U.N. workers who were to help implement the agreement.

A U.S. Embassy spokesman, Stanley Schrager, on Tuesday characterized the political efforts to return Aristide as "stymied."

Bishops plead with U.S.

Nation must realize global obligations

By DAVID BRIGGS
Associated Press

The United States should keep its ban on nuclear testing, stop peddling its arms around the world, and turn its swords into plowshares in Central America, Africa and the Middle East, Roman Catholic leaders say.

The proposal calling for the United States to combat a groundswell of isolationism comes a decade after the bishops' pastoral letter in nuclear arms propelled them into U.S. public policy debates at the height of the Cold War.

The new statement, "The Harvest of Justice is Sown in Peace," says the United States retains a moral responsibility to intervene in regional conflicts and to increase humanitarian aid to countries where it once battled communism.

"'Liberty and justice for all' is not only a profound national pledge; it is also a worthy goal for a world leader," the bishops said.

The statement was written by some of the nation's most influential bishops, including Cardinals Joseph Bernardin of Chicago and Roger Mahony of Los Angeles; Archbishop John R. Roach of Minneapolis, chairman of the bishops' International Policy Committee; and Bishop James Malone of Youngstown, Ohio, a former president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Gen. Colin Powell, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was among those to appear before the committee.

The policy statement will be presented by the committee to the full conference at its meeting Nov. 15-18 in Washington.

A decade ago, the bishops' pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace" drew a firestorm of protest from critics inside

Community tensions focus on alcohol policies

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Tensions between the Amherst residents, police and University of Massachusetts students were discussed when the Amherst Commission on Civility and Community Relations met last night at the Bangs Community Center.

The open forum was well attended by both students and community members who were given the chance to voice their concerns and solutions to problems dealing with the Amherst Police Department, off-campus parties and the new by-laws concerning noise and kegs.

Aaron Wilson, a senior Legal Studies major, felt the by-laws have given the police a "license to harass." He brought up an incident in which a friend of his was having a party and obtained a keg license. His friend purchased two kegs not realizing this was illegal. According to Wilson, a police officer saw this, followed his friend for about a quarter of a mile and then pulled him over, confiscating the alcohol and arresting him.

Emmon Bach and Barbara Partee, both professors in the Linguistics Department who reside on Hobart Lane, brought up the fact that the street has gotten worse due to its reputation.

Ted Chambers, a UMass graduate student, told the couple that he stopped going to Hobart when he found out that some non-students lived there.

"With 20,000 students on this campus, if we all put in 10 bucks, we could buy you out," said Chambers.

He pointed out the fact that 20 and 30 years ago, there was not a real big problem between the town and campus communities. Chambers felt that after the World Series riot in 1986, the University administration "washed their hands" of anything to do with alcohol on campus. He said the University has pitted students against non-students.

Agreeing with Chambers about how the University has reacted concerning alcohol, Paul Vasconcellos, assistant dean of students, said when the drinking age was 18 much more education about drinking was available and dormitory living was very different.

Some suggestions to come out of the meeting were an open forum between students and police and students and residents, for the University to reopen the Bluewall as a bar, to better educate students about alcohol consumption and more activities for students on campus.

The committee, consisting of Joe Swartz, Paul Vasconcellos, a representative from the Dean of Students office, Tony Ong and Michael Harris, president and vice-president of the Commuter Area Government, will take these concerns into consideration and present them to the Amherst Select Board at the next meeting.

Women to participate in El Salvador election

GORDON FENWICK / COLLEGIAN
Isabel Fabian

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

After 12 years of civil war, the people of El Salvador are organizing to participate in the 1994 presidential elections.

Isabel Fabian is one of the leaders of the revolutionary movement, "Farabundo Marti para la Liberacion Nacional", that engaged during the '80s in a guerrilla war to overthrow the government. Yesterday, she spoke at Hampshire College about the participation of women in the upcoming elections.

Fabian joined thousands of other women in the fight for land.

"In 1991, we signed the peace accords in Mexico. We decided to lay down our weapons and participate in the elections as a political party. In exchange, the government has to allow free elections," said Fabian.

According to Fabian, the FMLN political framework changed drastically after the peace accord.

"We are a revolutionary movement but we want democracy," Fabian said. "We don't want to be like Cuba or Nicaragua, we want a different system, a marxism for El Salvador."

The most important result of the peace accords was the Agrarian Reform, according to Fabian.

"Landowners will not be allowed to have more than 500 acres. If they do, they will be forced to sell their land at the market price," said Fabian. "It is important to remember that El Salvador is the smallest country in Central America but it holds the second largest population in the Isthmus. In El Salvador, "land is power."

Fabian is also the leader of the Melida Anaya Montes Women's Movement.

"My role is to defend the rights of the women of El Salvador," said Fabian. When asked about the role of women during the war, Fabian said that "women took arms and fought side by side with the men, and in many instances, performed better than men."

After the war, the women's movement became organized. "We struggled to change the traditional role of women in our society, we discovered that we have the same abilities as men," Fabian said.

Fabian said that "we must put an end to violence, alcoholism, sexual abuse, beatings and illiteracy."

A political platform was established by the 50 women organizations of El Salvador. The platform, said Fabian, "demands the creation of laws that defend women. It proposes solutions to our problems."

Only two political parties have agreed to incorporate in their political programs the demands of this broad coalition of women.

In El Salvador, 68 percent of the households are led by women. However, Fabian expressed concern about the discrimination women experience when trying to find employment. "There's no economic democracy, the law forbids women to own land," said Fabian.

UMass to be smoke-free

Dorms not affected in campus-wide ban

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

Come Monday, the long-promised smoking ban will make the University of Massachusetts a smoke-free environment.

Preparations are being taken by several different offices on campus to ready the University for the new policy, according to Paul Page, the vice-chancellor for administration and finance.

The Physical Plant is applying signs to all buildings stating the building is smoke-free.

"We are trying to put signs on all entrance and exit doors," Peter Wozniak, director of the Physical Plant said. He said the Physical Plant is approximately 30 percent done with the project and all the signs will be up in time for the start of the ban.

Chancellor David K. Scott issued a memorandum to all University faculty, staff and students in which he said the new policy was necessary in the interest of everyone's health, both smokers and non-smokers.

Enforcement of the ban will be the same as other University policies, said Don Robinson, director of Environmental Health and Safety.

There is a broad base of knowledge of the new policy, he said, but "peer pressure will be the ultimate enforcement vehicle."

Along with signs and warnings of the police, the University also offered smoking cessation programs, co-sponsored by Health Services and Kaiser Permanente, to faculty and students.

The workshops, "Smokers Independence", were offered twice, each lasting eight weeks. The second session began Oct. 25, according to Frances Deats, director of the Employee Assistance Program.

Page said these workshops were part of a union agreement to the smoking ban.

"It is an opportunity to stop smoking, but it is not a requirement," Deats said.

Smoking workshops have been offered in the past, particularly when there is a policy change, she said. Cessation groups were offered in 1986 when the smoking policy restricted smoking to designated areas.

The ban will include all buildings on campus, with the exception of certain rooms in the Campus Center Hotel and University-owned individual rooms and housing.

Residential halls have their own smoking policy which Robinson said may be under review.

The Newman Center is not a part of the University and does not have to comply with the ban, but Robinson said the University will try to encourage the Center to adopt a no-smoking policy.

Drunk driving problem focused on by students

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

Students Against Drunk Driving was first registered last year and has just recently had its first meeting earlier this month.

Sophomores Megan Risley and Lauren McQuade have come together to begin a SADD chapter at the University of Massachusetts.

"We wanted to make students aware that drinking and driving is a problem on college campuses. Especially on a big campus like UMass where people go to off-campus parties a lot and drive," said Risley, the president of SADD.

Risley said SADD has three goals: community awareness, campus awareness and the contract for life.

"For the community part, an idea we are talking around is going out to the area high schools and talking to them about drinking and driving," Risley said.

The group is also hoping to work with the resident assistants in order to help build drinking and driving awareness on campus.

"We wanted to come into the dorms and do a workshop with the students in order to raise awareness. It is an excellent way to reach the students," Risley said.

One of SADD's first activities is going to be setting up a table on the Campus Center Concourse. At the table, there will be educational items and promotional items to raise awareness of the group's existence.

There will also be contracts for life at the table.

"The contracts say that if you or a friend are in a situation where either of you have had too much to drink, you will find a responsible way of getting home," Risley said. "There is a contract between parents and their sons or daughters, and there is one between friends which is the one we will probably be working with the most."

Every Tuesday the group meets in the Campus Center between 8 and 9 p.m. Students can find out the specific room number at the activity directory in the Campus Center.

All questions about SADD can be answered by calling either Lauren at 546-3476, or Megan at 546-5476.

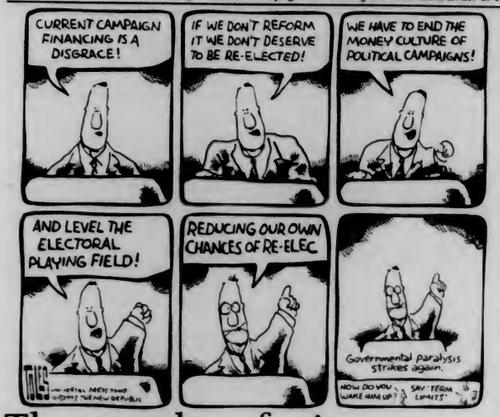
The History of the Citibank Classic Visa card and the Age of Credit Card Security.

In the 67th year of the 20th Century A.D., Citibank introduced a credit card aptly titled the Citibank Classic Visa® card. Established on the premise that a credit card should offer—24 hours a day—warm, personal service, the Citibank Classic Visa card marked the end of the Ice Age. And it ushered in a new era. ¶ With the introduction of the first Photocard, the credit card bearing one's own photo and signature on the front, it soon became evident that Man was entering the Post Paleolithic Period. First, Man was no longer looking like a Neanderthal, as one often does on more primitive cards such as the Student ID. He or she could now choose his or her own photo. Second, by deterring other anthropoids from using the card, Man was helping to prevent fraud. Surely this was a sign of advanced intelligence. ¶ The subsequent rise of services was nothing less than an American Revolution. So as you might expect, Citibank would be there for you, even if your card was stolen, or perhaps lost. The Lost Wallet℠ Service could have a new card in your hands usually within 24 hours. (You can almost hear Paul Revere crying, "The card is coming! The card is coming!") ¶ When the Great Student Depression came along, Citibank introduced New Deals—special student discounts and savings. Hence, today's student can enjoy a $20 Airfare Discount for domestic flights[1] (ushering in the Jet Age); savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, magazines and music; a low variable interest rate of 15.4%[2]; and, no annual fee. ¶ Finally, comes the day you enter the Classical Age (i.e. when you charge your purchases on the Citibank Classic card). You receive Citibank Price Protection to assure you of the best prices. Just see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150[3]. You receive Buyers Security℠, to cover those purchases against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase[3]. And Citibank Lifetime Warranty℠, to extend the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years[4]. Together they give you complete coverage; and with everything else…the Age of Credit Card Security. ¶ It's credit history in the making. With the help of Citibank's services and savings, you earn some of the credentials needed later on to purchase a car or even a house. ¶ So call to apply. Students don't need a job or a cosigner. Call, also, if you'd like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. The number is 1-800-CITIBANK (1-800-248-4226), extension 19. ¶ If after reading this chapter describing the prosperous conditions set forth by a Citibank Classic Visa card, one feels that he or she has left forever the Dark Ages and has entered upon a new age, the Age of Enlightenment, then your time, as they say, has come. Destiny is calling. And so should you.

This (ahie) dated 1558 BC was the first known attempt to put one's photo on a credit card—but not without drawbacks. Photography had not yet been invented, it weighed over 50 pounds, and it did not fit easily into a wallet.

Had Napoleon carried a Citibank Classic Visa card with its Lost Wallet Service, he would not have been compelled to hold one hand perpetually to the wallet inside his jacket.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.



Offer expires 6/30/94. Minimum ticket purchase price is $100. Rebates are for Citibank student cardmembers on tickets issued by ISE. Flights only. The Annual Percentage Rate for purchases is 15.4% as of 8/93 and may vary quarterly. The Annual Percentage Rate for cash advances is 19.8%. If a finance charge is imposed, the minimum is 50 cents. There is an additional finance charge for each cash advance transaction equal to 2% of the amount of each cash advance transaction, however, it will not be less than $2.00 or greater than $10.00. Certain conditions and exclusions apply. Please refer to your Summary of Additional Program Information. Buyers Security is underwritten by The Zurich International (U.K.) Limited. Certain restrictions and limitations apply. Underwritten by the New Hampshire Insurance Company. Service life expectancy varies by product and is at least the minimum based on retail industry data. The wonder of wieners

Just you watch, folks; I've invented what is going to be the smash health-food marketing sensation of the 90s: "CRYSTAL WIENERS — The Clear Hot Dogs!"

That's right: an invisible hot dog for a health-conscious decade. You betcha, it'll seem healthier than the regular brownish-pink wieners of the past. You'll say, "Hell, it can't be too bad for me if I can't even see it!" But man oh man, let me assure you that when you bite into that see-through wienie, you'll be in for a juicy taste sensation you've never known in an invisible meat product.

Mark Tyler
WENHAM

So, you're wondering how we get an invisible frankfurter. Why, from invisible pigs, of course. And yes, invisible pigs are healthier than regular pigs. Everybody knows that; it's just good old common sense. But how do we arrive at invisible pigs?

It starts in my top secret genetic manipulations lab. Although it's a trade secret how I go about making these rare see-through porkers, I can tell you that it has something to do with pulsing a good 3 million megawatts of a special classified recipe of ultraviolet, ozone-charged, plutonium booster-juice-invisible-radio-frequency electricity, into a pregnant mother pig. ZOP! After she gets done smoking and popping and thrashing around like an electric toothbrush on powerful amphetamines, her fetuses have been genetically fused with radio frequencies to create invisible DNA and a few weeks later THE LITTLE BABIES POP OUT OF MOMMY AS CLEAR AS THE AIR IN FRONT OF YOUR FACE!

Yowza! The wonders of science and plutonium-treated pregnant pigs! Let's see Mister Oscar Mayer go through all that trouble to bring you a hot dog.

I should tell you that I'm also currently working with cows, chickens, and a processed cheese spread, which I've named "Invisiveeta." Hell, you'll be able to eat a whole brick of Invisiveeta and not feel guilty about it! If you can't see it, it's almost like you never actually ate it, right?

Now, I hear some of you grumbling in horror about the mother pig treatment. Yes, yes, it's a tiny bit uncomfortable for a pregnant animal to be zapped with enough nuclear-based electricity to run a small city for a day, but I feel the end result is worth it. I mean, think about it: CRYSTAL WIENERS! Not only is this an advancement in barbecue cuisine technology, but it's a giant step forward for all of science. If a few pregnant porkers get zopped to a near-crisp in the process, well then, that's what progress is all about.

How is clear pork healthier than your average hum-drum visible pork? Well, being that this kind of agricultural technology is so futuristic, the Environmental Protection Agency currently has no way of testing or verifying anything I'm saying here. And by the time they're able to, I'll have sold enough clear hot dogs, Ground Crystal Burger Patties, Invisiveeta, and Transparent Chicken Nuggets to set me up for the rest of my life.

But yes, they're better for you because they seem like they're healthier. Just as Crystal Pepsi seems better for you, you're actually marginally healthier drinking it. It's the whole placebo/mind-over-matter ordeal. If you believe it's healthier, then your mind keeps your body from getting quite as unhealthy. See? That means you won't die as soon if you're eating lots of Crystal Wieners. Yes, you will die from them, but just not as soon as if you were stuffing your head with regular wieners.

And isn't that what health is really about in America? Not necessarily living longer with vigor and a strong, robust peace of body and mind; no, friends, health in America is about being the same old cruddy, obese, diseased lumps that we've always been. . .but not dying as soon.

If my new invisible meats and processed cheese spread can help Americans prolong their miserable, diseased lives, then God praise those crisped mother pigs.

Brutality goes unpunished

"Serbs would torture us by extinguishing their cigarettes on our bodies. However, that was reserved mostly for Muslim women. Serbs would extinguish their cigarettes on the Muslim womens' naked bodies, mostly their breasts and vaginas. Serbs would also shove bottles (mostly half-liter beer bottles) up the Muslim girls' vaginas. . ."

This is just one of the plethora of brutal and savage cases submitted by the government of Bosnia-Herzegovinia to the international Court of Justice at the Hague (Netherlands) earlier this year concerning the bestialities committed by the Serbs.

Ali
MAHDI

The ethnic cleansing that is being practiced in Bosnia is appalling and horrendous. The physical liquidation of a particular sect of people must come to a halt. It is sad that such blatant aggression is continuing, unpunished and unchecked. The cowardice and squeamish attitudes of the rest of the world, standing as mere spectators to this catastrophe, is shameful.

This only strengthens the arguments of weaker nations for acquiring weapons of mass destruction for self defense. Why not? If the United Nations and the world cannot cease the genocide in Bosnia, what guarantee can the United Nations give to other countries with powerful neighbors of their complete security? Organizations such as the United Nations, NATO and the European Community have lost their credibility. They seem to be paralyzed and have all but given up on the Bosnian issue.

Today, the Serb militias have as many as 400 tanks, over 600 heavy artillery pieces, some 40 helicopters and also a number of fixed wing aircraft as against the Bosnian's 40 tanks, a small number of light guns, four helicopters and no military planes. The United Nations has resisted lifting the arms embargo on supplying weapons to the Bosnian Muslims fearing that it might induce further conflict.

This conduct of the Security Council is in violation of Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations recognizes the right of Bosnia-Herzegovinia to individual and collective defense. As of now, 200,000 Bosnian Muslims have been killed, 50,000 Muslim women have been raped and 2 million have lost their homes. The Serbs and Croats control 90 percent of the country.

People have died, families have been torn apart and dreams have been shattered. Children, who are an innocent audience to this chaotic bloodbath have been swallowed into it and are being incessantly annihilated for no rhyme or reason. Girls, of the tender age of five have been brutally raped and many of them have been raped more than 10 times. What do these girls have to live for now? They have been dishonored at such a delicate age.

It is disappointing that the first main challenge presented to the international community in this post cold war order has rewarded the perpetrators and punished the victims. The sacrosanct principle of prohibiting the gain of territory by force has been abandoned by the United Nations as the Vance-Stoltenberg peace plan rewards the Serbs and Croats with 70 percent of Bosnia and the Bosnians with only 30 percent thus creating a greater Serbia and Greater Croatia. Why should the Bosnians be expected to acquiesce to these terms of trades that allow the trespassers of their land to be heralded as victors. Might should not be right, but it seems that in this day and age, it unfortunately is.

Cartoonist issues an apology

I would like to apologize to Ellen Davis and anyone else I may have offended with my cartoon ["Steve" Collegian, Oct. 20]. I had no intention of being cruel, and I didn't mean to convey the thought that dsylexic people think or speak backwards. I'll be more considerate in the future.

We can no longer ignore horror

Stephanie Eisenberg's column was both powerfully moving and disturbing [Collegian Oct. 21]. Disturbing because we have recently seen that the attitudes that led to her family's deaths are still flourishing among us, even here at UMass.

The Holocaust was not just one aberration in history. Jews have been the victims of — and survived — literally thousands of years of expulsions, enslavement, pogroms, and other attempts at genocide.

While I am sure that many people were horrified at the events in Germany, for the most part, the world looked away, too ambivalent, uninformed or uncaring; too concerned with politics to do anything to even try to stop the murders.

And what is happening today? We have only to look to Europe or read the papers to see that yet another Holocaust is happening in Bosnia. And what are we doing to stop it? Will we be looking back 50 years from now, lamenting at how the world looked on at these sacrifices unfolding today, "too horrified to do anything?"

Let us never forget these horrors, nor the attitudes that led to them. We must do whatever we can to confront this growing anti-Semitism — the growing hatred and intolerance everywhere — educating ourselves and others so that, maybe we can begin to live together in peace on this beautiful planet; so that, in the words that remember and honor those six million lost lives, "Never again!"

The Peace Corps offers a satisfying alternative to CIA destruction

I have just read Michael Morrissey's editorial renouncing a student for discussing the possibility of entering the Peace Corps rather than the C.I.A. [Collegian, Oct. 21].

He describes the C.I.A. as "one of the only government agencies that does any work" and describes that work as "gathering facts so our government can have information from which to make decisions. Without such information, our government gets into sticky situations that embarrass us all." This is an absurdly simple and naive description of the C.I.A.'s activities.

First of all, the C.I.A. is constantly embarrassing us all with scandals such as the Iran-Contra affair and the Bay of Pigs Invasion. Secondly, the C.I.A. is famous the world over for its covert installations and dissolutions of governments of developing nations. Most famous of these, the installation of Ngo Dinh Diem in Vietnam, led to a great war. In other cases, the results of C.I.A. activities have greatly contributed to maintaining, if not creating, the horrible social and economic conditions of these countries, such as Nicaragua, Panama, Haiti, Guatemala, and Somalia. In fact, I think that Mr. Morrissey would be hard pressed to show us an example of a country that is in need of help from the Peace Corps whose conditions have not been perpetuated by the C.I.A.

According to Morrissey, a person who is more interested in helping starving people grow food than don a three-piece suit and a grin in search of the oval office is essentially "wasting two years of (his/her) life...making lots of friends with people that you'll never see again."

This self-centered sentiment is one of the worst problems in our society. While Morrissey calls "true patriots...George Bush, Oliver North, and Bill Casey" his heroes, mine are individuals who choose to forego personal gratification to help others. When are the "Morrissites" of this world going to realize that there would be no need for either of these organizations if we helped each other and stopped thinking only of ourselves?

New Africa House . . . Black to the Future

By MARC COUSINS
Collegian Staff

The Benjamin Banneker Microcomputer Learning Facility is in the house, The New Africa House that is. The only computer facility on campus designated predominantly for the use of minority student is alive, well and ready for use.

The brain-child of Afro-American Studies Professor and present facility director, Ernie Allen Jr., was proposed in the mid '80s with the encouragement and support of the former chair of The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEMBS). Allen explained that at the time many trivialized the notion of getting computers for the minority population on campus.

"Computer stores were like hobby stores in the late '70s and early '80s," Allen said.

He went on to say that he noticed there were few if any Blacks in the stores. Allen said he realized that Black and other minority students did not have access to this type of technology, unlike the many White students from schools he visited in places like Martha's Vineyard and Fairfield, Conn.

Allen admits, due to the lack of University funds, the project was slow in coming. The World Series incident of 1986 and demands made consequently began the planning of the renovation of the fourth floor of The New Africa House where the Banneker was to be housed.

Since March of 1989, the Banneker facility, run by the University, has been open to CCEMBS, Afro-American Studies majors, students enrolled in Afro-American Studies computer lab courses, United Asian Learning and Resource Center (UALRC) and the Bilingual Collegiate Program. Special hours have been set aside so all the members of the University community may use the facilities. One purpose of the Banneker facility is to offer students a foundation in computers. Banneker hosts updated Apple computing equipment including: Macintosh LsII's, LaserWriter printing, CD Rom, and data scanning.

The Afro-American Studies department and CCEMBS tried something original in naming the hardware. Harriet Tubman, Frederick Douglass and Sojourner Truth are the just a few of the prominent 19th century Afro-American names given to each computer station.

When asked what was some future goals of the Banneker, Allen said, "What we are trying to do now is broaden the services but this takes money."

"Every semester we do outreach programs to let people know the facilities exist. Drop in and check out the facilities, don't wait until mid-term and finals when the lines are out the door," Allen said.

Al Sharpton to Speak at FAC

By JAMES WAIRE
and MICHELE MONTEIRO
Collegian Staff

On Nov. 9, 1993, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc. and the Office of Third World Affairs presents the Reverend Al Sharpton at the Fine Arts Center at 8:00 p.m.

The Rev. Sharpton has earned international prominence and is a national symbol of social action and progressive politics with his direct action techiques, which include rallies, lectures, articles etc.

Sharpton has brought the world's attention to the racially charged murders of Michael Griffith, at Howard Beach, New York in 1986, and Yuseff Hawkins at Bensonhurst, New York,in 1989. Sharpton has also helped to focus world attention on the Bernard Goetz subway shooting in 1985, and the Tawanna Brawley rape case in 1987.

Sharpton's techniques led to the first major criminal conviction of individuals prosecuted for criminal crimes involving racial bias and motive.

Al Sharpton, a native of Brooklyn, New York, attended and graduated from Tilden High School in 1972. While there, Sharpton was the vice-president of the Student Government, and the president of the Afro-American Club. After graduation, Sharpton attended Brooklyn College, majoring in contemporary politics until his sophomore year.

Sharpton, from the age of 12, was interested in politics. He became involved with the Greater New York Area branch of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), originally founded by Martin Luther King Jr.

Sharpton was soon appointed youth director by Rev. Jesse Jackson and the Rev. William Jones Jr. Sharpton was responsible, as head of the youth division, to raise public consciousness about businesses practicing discriminatory policies. This was done through protests and boycott.

In 1971, Sharpton founded the National Youth Movement Inc. (NYM). He was responsible for voter registration drives, and for providing business opportunities and policing systems for New York's Black neighborhoods.

In 1992, Sharpton announced that he would enter the New York State Democratic Senate Primary. He acquired 16% of the total state vote, 21% of the New York City vote, and over 70% of the state's African-American voters' support. Based on these figures, Sharpton authorized an exploratory committee for another U.S. Senate run in 1994.

Sharpton will speak on the direction of the civil rights movement for African-Americans in his lecture "The New Civil Rights Agenda of the '90s", Tuesday, Nov. 9., 1993 at the Fine Arts Center. For more information, call the Office of Third World Affairs at 545-2517.

MY NAME

BY MATTHEW COX

(It is enough to just say that my name was Black like Jesus and Moses . . . but you wouldn't accept it.)

My name is written in hieroglyphics. It could be heard in Kemet and in Nubia, ancient civilizations in Akebulan.

My name is older than you. It is older than time itself; for time is only an illusion of the temporary. It is much older than the city of Romulus and Ramus. It existed before your caves and even before Adam. All of the seven wonders of the world encompass my name. It is 451 feet high, made of 2,500,000 blocks, each two and a half tons. Like the pyramids, you have yet learned to build, my name is too complex for your understanding.

You cannot shoot my name and bury it in the woods. You cannot hang my name from a tree, or castrate it, because my name is too big for castration. The value of my name is much greater than forty acres and a mule . . .

But, I am lost now, because I do not know my name. You took it from me, also taking the essence which is my soul. You have given me a new name which bears little meaning to me, and called me many others — nigger, coon, spook, sambo, ghost, etc. Remember? In an effort to destroy me (it has been said that what you can't understand you fear and in your fear, you strike out seeking to destroy . . .), you have hidden my name.

You lead me away in chains, forcing me, with a whip in your right hand and a King James' book in your left, to leave my name. You buried it under a thousand lies . . .lies which you fooled yourself into believing. In an attempt to lessen your feelings of inferiority, you claimed yourself superior. These lies and new names you used to imprison me in a state of mental deadness. But Black skeletons at the bottom of the Atlantic screamed my name. Can you hear them?

I do not know my name, but I know it has power. It must. Why else would you have taken it from me? It is as powerful as the sun 93 million miles away. Might my name be Ra?

. . . I have been digging through your lies. Yes, soon I will find it and I . . . will reclaim it as mine. Then will I scream it from atop Mt. Kilimanjaro.

My name I will bellow . . .sending you running, screaming back to your caves as Babylon crumbles around you. The power in my name will make me rule of all the third eye sees as I once was. When I know my name, I will rule the universe.

When I know my name . . .

HSCN: Woody's witty Wives

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

After two strong weeks of movies, the Housing Services Cable Network runs to a stand still this week. Maybe it's a conspiracy to make us study more for mid-terms, then again maybe not. Anyway, the three that I'll recommend from the batch are Deep Cover, Husbands and Wives, and Die Hard II.

Deep Cover — This is not a great film, but a good, entertaining one all the same. Larry Fishburne plays an undercover cop who eventually gets so frustrated with the justice system that he flirts with joining the drug dealers he's supposed to nail. Jeff Goldblum also does an excellent job as a brainy drug dealer who wants to design a new drug. A good story, with the exception of a few flaws in the ending, makes for an enjoyable, dark movie. A-

Die Hard II — Bruce Willis returns to his role as John McClane, this time taking the action to Dulles Airport. Apparently, terrorists have taken over the airport, leaving a bunch of planes unable to land (it's night, and they shut off the landing lights). I'll let you in on a minor flaw in the plot folks; I used to live in Washington, D.C., and there are at least three other airports in the area to land at. This detail aside though, the movie still is an action-packed ride that definitely gets the blood pumping. Not as good as the first one, mainly because the bad guys are not nearly as interesting as Alan Rickman's complex role in the first one, but check it out if you haven't already seen it. A-

Jewel of the Nile — Another sequel that doesn't quite add up to the original (Romancing the Stone). The movie isn't that bad though — Michael Douglas and Kathleen Turner work together very well — but the story seems forced. This time they're trying to save some sort of holy man from terrorists. Danny DeVito returns to his role as Ralph, a man who will do anything for a buck. This movie is just entertainment, and for that it is partially successful. B-

Silent Night, Deadly Night — Mark this one up right under Friday the 13th in the cheezy horror flick department. I saw this garbage about seven years ago, when I was going through my "I'll watch any movie" phase. From what I remember, it's basicalliy about a guy who dresses up like Santa Claus and goes around hacking up people. The movie has the fame of sending mother's everywhere into conniptions over using our favorite myth for a horror movie. Dumb and repulsive, rather than watch this drudge, open your window wide and yell, "I'm mad as hell, and I'm not going to take it anymore!" Then call the cluster office, and complain that somebody's being loud in your building. F

Husbands and Wives — This Woody Allen film came out with a wave of controversy because it's supposed to be close to what happened in his personal life. The movie is still really good though, and should be seen on its own. Husbands and Wives has a few laughs mixed in with the more serious aspects of love, commitment and marriage. Judy Davis probably should have won an Oscar for her performance as an eccentric divorcee. Not as good as Manhattan or Annie Hall, but worth checking out. A-

Movies not reviewed on HSCN this week: Iron Eagle III, Ambition, Animal Behavior, Buffy the Vampire Slayer, Avalon, Cocoon: The Return, Ethan Frome, Flight of the Phoenix, Men's Club, Opposite Sex, Shadow of the Wolf, The Temp, Thank God It's Friday.

Mariah Watch:

The Mullins Center released late yesterday a fax which confirmed that Mariah Carey will perform there at 7 p.m. on Friday, Oct. 29. Tickets to the show, deemed a "dress rehearsal," are to be attained in a multi-step process.

From 7 p.m. until 12 a.m. yesterday, and again at 7 a.m. this morning, hand-stamps and numbers were available at the Mullins Center Box Office which qualify prospective concert-goers to stand in line for tickets today starting at 9 a.m. People will be asked to line up on the Mullins Center Concourse according to their designated numbers. Those without stamps and numbers will not be allowed on the Concourse.

If you understood any of that, and were able to somehow discover this ordeal early enough, tickets go on sale at 10 a.m. today.

Thus far, there has been no formal statement that the Midnight Madness event schedule has been changed.

Quest tops off triple lineup

Tribe Called Quest
Pearl Street
Oct. 25, 1993

Monday night in Northampton, hip-hop fans turned out in large numbers to see a powerful bill of performers. A Tribe Called Quest and De La Soul, along with a bonus opening act, Souls of Mischief, played before a sold-out audience at Pearl Street.

Doors for the show opened at 8 p.m. and much to the impatience of the crowd, the first act did not go on for over two hours. At this point, most people were expecting Tribe, but a new group, California natives Souls of Mischief took the stage.

For a new act, Souls put on a fairly good show and the crowd responded to them well. They were more upbeat and had a louder sound than the other two acts, producing a good mix. They managed to get the crowd going and when they ended their four-song set, the crowd was pumped for the remainder of the show.

As the clock approached 11 p.m. and the crowd just about at wit's end, Tribe made a triumphant appearance on stage. The fans quickly forgot their wait and jumped right into the show.

They opened with a series of songs from their second album, The Low End Theory, and the crowd sang along as they danced to the beat. Throughout the night, Tribe played a large sample from that album, including popular songs like "Scenario" and "What?", but all the songs seemed to be crowd favorites.

The highlight of the night consisted of a lineup of songs from their debut album. Including the sexy love song "Bonnita Applebum" and my personal favorite "Can I Kick It?". To Tribe: Phife, Q-Tip, Muhammad — "Yes, you can."

Tribe also gave a little sample from their upcoming album, Midnight Marauders during the show. The album, due out on November 9th, sounds very promising.

To end the night, hip-hop stars De La Soul put on an enthusiastic set, but the crowd was moving a little slow as the clock approached midnight. De La Soul did a good job of keeping the crowd on its toes though.

They played a mix from their albums and some new material such as their latest single, "Ego Trip". They also pleased the crowd when they claimed "We hate this song. We hate this song....." and then went into one of the crowd's favorite, "Me Myself, and I".

They also played "Eye patch", "Pot holes in my Lawn" and when Tribe called Quest joined them on stage to help perform, they all sung an excellent version of "Buddy".

When the long night was over and all the "true" hip-hop fans went on their way, weary legs and all, I can honestly say few, if any, were disappointed, and all were smiling.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Someday when you're sorry, someday when you're free, memories will remind you that our love was meant to be. But late at night when you call my name, the only sound you'll hear will be the sound of your voice calling after me."
– Genesis, Throwing It All Away

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Gossip or confusion about a project could burst to the surface now. Remain calm and avoid doing battle. Once the dust settles, your star will shine brighter than ever.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Conflicts or errors could escalate. Double-check your work and be courteous to your co-workers. A compromise can keep those molehills from turning into mountains.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Timing is the key to success in business. It would be unwise to push ahead at this moment. Maintain a slow and steady pace. Putting in a little overtime could prove lucrative.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Matters related to business or the law demand prompt attention. Listen sympathetically to someone's problems but avoid making promises that could be difficult to fulfill.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): An out-of-town visitor could alter your plans for the day. Welcome the change of pace. This afternoon, a financial disclosure could cause some resentment.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Clearing away the clutter at work will improve both your surroundings and your efficiency. It may be time to make some hard decisions about a close relationship.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Let go of the past and happiness will be yours in abundance. You can be proud of what you have accomplished during hard times.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A family member could be touchy now. Diplomacy helps you sail through a difficult situation. A secret alliance fills the gap left by a temporary rift.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Caution will help you avert a crisis. Follow up tips regarding stocks and bonds and you could run a quick profit. A romantic evening puts you in a mellow mood.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Comparison shopping helps cut expenses. Brown bag your lunch if you are dieting. Correspondence requires prompt attention. Old contacts play a role in your meeting new friends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 19): Productivity rises when you set priorities and stick to them. Important questions are answered. Be more attentive to a parent or a child.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Approach those in authority about a big project. Obtaining public support for a pet cause could be easier than you think. Ask influential people for their backing and advice.

the church and in the Reagan administration for its call to reduce military spending and the nation's nuclear arsenal.

"After the Cold War, there has emerged an understandable but dangerous temptation to turn inward, to focus only on domestic needs and to ignore global responsibilities. This is not an option for believers in a universal church or for citizens in the world's most powerful nation," the bishops said.

In the new statement, the bishops resist calls for unilateral disarmament, but say nuclear deterrence is morally acceptable only if it is a step toward progressive disarmament.

The United States would set a moral example by retaining its moratorium on nuclear testing while pursuing a global test ban, the bishops said. Hours after China detonated a nuclear bomb earlier this month, President Clinton ordered preparations for a possible resumption of U.S. nuclear testing.

Because of insufficient fuel, deliveries of drinkable water to the capital's huge Cite Soleil slum were cut by two-thirds on Tuesday.

On Tuesday, armed thugs at one station commandeered buckets of gasoline then sold it nearby for $6 a gallon. The only people seen leaving the station with gasoline were carrying guns.

Scattered shooting was reported in some sections of the capital. Gunshots killed a 25-year-old woman inside her home Tuesday, independent Radio Metropole reported. Another man was found shot to death on the streets of the Bel Air neighborhood.

Seven civilian army auxiliaries beat up, robbed and then dragged a street vendor into her home and raped her in the capital's Petionville suburb Monday evening, neighbors said.

The United States maintained a security alert for its nationals. Schrager, the U.S. Embassy spokesman, said there had been "unconfirmed threats that mid-level American diplomats or people who work for international organizations" might become targets of violence.

performance.

"It's great to go undefeated," Scurry said. "We usually get upset by some team out there and we didn't do that this season."

The lone goal came just 1:31 after halftime. UMass gained possession of the kickoff and forced a corner kick. Heidi Kocher's serve went to the center of the goal box, where Rebecca Myers won a head ball with UVM keeper Sara Lesperance, and knocked the ball toward the goal. Melissa Mitchell one-timed it in from 2-yards out for the game winner.

"Myers just won the ball and it got to Mitchell who turned and put it home," Rudy said. "It was a nice serve by Heidi. It was laid right in there."

The win not only gives UMass the unofficial Northeast championship but also strengthens its bid to host the first two rounds of the NCAA Tournament, to be held Nov. 13-14.

The Minutewomen will attempt to capture the inaugural A-10 Championship this weekend, when the league's post-season tournament is held at Rutgers.

ning. I'm doing what I can do and trying to be the best at it."

A possible return trip to final four looms large in her goals for this season's Minutewomen.

Salisbury is not ready to stop and reflect yet, as her collegiate career nears its finish.

"I love to play field hockey and I hope that my career doesn't end here. I want to go on and participate at a higher level."

Playing in this summer's Olympic festival has taken Salisbury one step closer to fulfilling a dream.

"My ultimate dream is to go to the Olympics. I started the developmental program in the eighth grade. I've been going to A Camp [the highest level of the US developmental camps] since I started college, participating with the national team. Playing in the festival has only made my dream stronger."

When she finally does hang up her cleats, Salisbury wants her work ethic and will to win to be her trademarks.

"I'd want to be remembered as a very hard worker and that all I ever wanted was for the team to be successful and I was willing to do anything I could to make our team successful."

pound the ball up the gut of Penn State's defense.

HATFIELD'S VS. MCCOY'S: For pure hatred, nothing can beat a Florida-Georgia game. We're talking about two teams that had to move their student seating sections back 25 rows for this game because the students were injuring the players from the opposing squad.

Gator Coach Steve Spurrier took part in this series as a Florida player in the late 60s, so he knows what it's all about and should have no trouble motivating his players for an undermanned Bulldog team. The only thing the 'Dawgs have going for them is Eric Zeier.

I repeat Eric Zeier is a Heisman candidate. The junior quarterback threw for four-and-a-quarter and three touchdowns and has remained consistently spectacular despite the lack of a supporting cast.

Just when you thought that the Army-Navy game was going to mean something this year for the first time in a long time, both teams had to go and get blown out of the water last weekend.

Army was 4-2 and sitting on the fence for a bowl bid before they ran into the tepid Boston College Eagles who rolled over them like a Suzuki Samurai, 41-14. Sophomore fullback Akili King is a gem for the Cadets — the best they've had since Mike Mayweather.

Navy was also 4-2 before they got whitewashed by Louisville, 28-0. It was a loss the Middies could not afford because they will have their record evened this weekend at the hands of Notre Dame, who is without its top two QBs in Kevin McDougall (separated shoulder) and Ron Powlus (rebroken collarbone).

"CACTUS CURTAIN" LOSES STING: Look for the Arizona Wildcats to fall from the ranks of the unbeaten this weekend against UCLA.

After starting 0-2, the Bruins have reeled off five straight, including victories over Stanford, Washington and BYU, and will probably finish at 9-2 and land in a bowl on New Year's Day.

No. 5 Reds unblemished in Northeast region

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Nicole Roberts and the No. 5 University of Massachusetts women's soccer team remained undefeated in the Northeast region defeating Vermont 1-0 yesterday.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team wrapped up its regular season yesterday in Burlington, VT, by downing Vermont, 1-0, and in the process completed its regional slate undefeated, something it had not accomplished since 1987.

The Minutewomen, ranked No. 1 in the region and No. 5 nationally, end the season 13-2-3 and 9-0-1 against Northeast competition. Only a 0-0 tie at Dartmouth, ranked No. 14 nationally, kept UMass from perfection.

"We are the Northeast regular season champions," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "That is a nice feeling."

The win virtually assures UMass an NCAA Tournament bid, something even the normally conservative thinking Rudy agrees is probably in the bag. In five of Rudy's six seasons UMass' post-season chances have hinged on late-season results and selection committee whims.

In 1990, the Minutewomen, despite believing they had earned a bid, were left at home by the NCAA committee. The unexplainable snub still weighs heavily on the program's psyche.

Throughout this season, as with most recent years, UMass played second fiddle to rivals Connecticut and Hartford in national and regional polls. The Minutewomen were rarely permitted the respect they proved they deserved.

Thus, the feeling of having a bid wrapped up this early, and the fact UMass sits atop the regional rankings, looking down at its detractors, is something for UMass to relish in.

"It is a very good feeling because it means we took care of business during the regular season," Rudy said. "Since my first season here, all of my teams have been nipped by an unlikely opponent. We've always gotten upset. But really good teams don't get upset."

UMass goalkepper Briana Scurry, who recorded her 11th shutout of the season yesterday, and is the favorite to be named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, is likewise pleased with the regular season

Time for OSU to step up big

Rumor has it that Syracuse and Michigan are going to hook up on Jan. 1 for the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Disgustingly Overrated and Hideously Underachieving Bowl.

The expert prognosticators consistently rated these two teams as the only teams capable of challenging Florida State for the national championship. Now they couldn't challenge an asthmatic in a breath-holding contest.

IT DOESN'T GET ANY EASIER EITHER BOYS: Syracuse hosts the nation's leading passer, Jake Kelchner, and the best West Virginia Mountaineers team this side of 1988. A side note to this one is the fact that last weekend, WVU beat Pitt by 21 points while two weeks ago, the 'Cuse could only muster a three-point victory over the Panthers.

Meanwhile the Sheep in Wolverines' clothing travel to Madison to face Wisconsin. There are a lot of angry Cheeseheads in Dairy Land because of last week's loss to Minnesota. Look for the Badgers to rebound and get back on track for an outside shot for the Rose Bowl.

TIME TO WALK THE WALK: We'll finally see if the Ohio State Buckeyes are for real this weekend when the Nittany Lions come a'callin in Columbus. Cooper, Hoying, Galloway, Wilkinson and Co. have done well so far against the Purdues and Northwesterns, but the Run for the Roses begins this Saturday for OSU as they host Penn State and then hit the road for dates at Wisconsin and Michigan.

The Buckeyes have too much offense for the Nittany Lions. Joey Galloway is as big a game-breaker as anyone in the nation sans Charlie Ward. Raymont Harris leads a talented and dependable corps of running backs that will

Salisbury shines in senior year

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Good players pile up statistics. The great ones dominate games and make their teammates better. For the third-ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey, that great player is senior forward Jenn Salisbury.

Salisbury came to UMass as a highly regarded recruit out of Newville, Pa., where she played her high school field hockey with current teammate Tracy Barclay. She was a high school All-American in her junior and senior years.

"I was looking for a forward that could score," said UMass head coach Pam Hixon. "She has fulfilled those expectations."

Penn State recruited Salisbury at first, but when she met Hixon, her mind was made up.

"I really wasn't thinking about going to college," said Salisbury "but once I met Pam, I really didn't care to go to see any other schools. I really liked her. I thought that UMass would be the only place I would want to go if I did go."

Salisbury did decide to further her education, a decision that has been very beneficial for the Minutewomen, as Salisbury has been a catalyst in keeping the winning tradition of UMass field hockey alive. Salisbury credits the upperclassmen for instilling a winning attitude early in her collegiate career.

"Being able to start some games as a freshman, playing with seniors and juniors that have a winning attitude, you want to win to make them happy," Salisbury said.

Last year, Salisbury elevated her game to the next level. She was named Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Year, scoring 11 goals and 17 assists to lead the A-10 in scoring in her junior season. Her play was a key part of the Minutewomen's drive to the NCAA Final Four.

This season Salisbury has picked up right where she left off, placing third in the A-10 scoring race (28 points), and is leading the league with 18 assists. Her goal output is down compared to last season, but her excellent passing has opened up scoring chances for the rest of the Minutewomen.

"I love to score goals, but I came to the realization that it makes you feel so much better to be a part of someone else getting goals," Salisbury said. "People say that statistics are everything, but you don't really need them to have confidence in yourself that you're doing a good job."

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Jenn Salisbury will be counted on to continue her strong play as the University of Massachusetts field hockey team heads toward post season.

That confidence has been a factor in her strong play this season.

"When I started this season, the only personal goal I had was to build on the mental aspect of my game," said Salisbury. "I think I have attained that goal."

The success that UMass has achieved in her final collegiate season has been satisfying to the senior forward.

"For myself, I'm really happy with how the season is going, because I do help out the team a lot with all my assists. It's very important to me to be a part of win-

Minutewomen upset by BU

In a game that originally started last Thursday evening but was suspended with 26:24 to play in the second half due to inclement weather, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team was defeated by Boston University 2-1 Tuesday at Nickerson Field.

The loss was the first for the No. 3 Minutewomen since an opening-game 1-0 loss against Northwestern University. Massachusetts' record drops to 14-2 (4-0 in the Atlantic 10) while the No. 10 Terriers improved to 12-3-1.

The two teams were tied 1-1 before a bolt of lightning interrupted the proceedings Thursday. BU's winning goal came at 58:18 when its leading scorer, Chris LaPointe, took a pass from Michele Barnard and blasted a 25-yard shot past Minutewoman keeper Hilary Rose, who allowed more than one goal in a game for the first time all season.

The Terriers took a 1-0 lead at 3:03 when Margaret Walsh scored unassisted, marking only the second time all year Massachusetts has trailed in a game.

The Minutewomen tied the score at 7:18 when senior co-captain Holly Hockenbrock took a give-and-go penalty corner pass from junior sweeper Natalie Hart and shot it past BU keeper Kerry Wingardner.

Massachusetts held a significant advantage in every aspect of the game except the final score by outshooting the Terriers 30-8 and holding a 15-0 advantage in penalty corners.

Massachusetts returns to action this weekend when they travel to North Carolina for two games. The Minutewomen play Duke University Friday and North Carolina Saturday afternoon.

Legal Services bill heads to committee

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The Education Committee of the Massachusetts legislature yesterday approved Senate Bill 301, a bill mandating the Legal Services Center at the University of Massachusetts be granted limited litigation rights, Senator Amy Lloyd said at the Student Government Association meeting last night.

The bill will now go to the House Ways and Means joint committee for a vote.

"After we lobbied them [the state legislators] and told them facts about the case, they were very supportive," Lloyd said. "The bill passed unanimously except for one abstention."

The bill represents the SGA's legislative attempt to restore litigation rights to the LSC. They are also lobbying the University Board of Trustees to grant the LSC its litigation rights that it took away in 1986.

The Trustees will have their next meeting at UMass on Dec. 1, where they will vote on whether to restore litigation rights to the LSC or not.

Trustee Al Lizana urged students to attend the Dec. 1 meeting.

"The trustees are very concerned about the Dec. 1 meeting," Lizana said. "They try to avoid Amherst because they know that the students are active and that we have a voice. If we get 1,000 students to attend the meeting we can make the trustees nervous."

Lizana said some trustees oppose the LSC because of bitterness towards the LSC for suing the University in 1984.

"The reason some of the trustees give for not allowing the LSC to have partial litigation rights is that it is bad public policy [for the LSC to be suing members of the town.] What that means I don't know," he said.

"I think a lot of the trustees are still bitter about the University being sued after the Yvette Henry case. Most of the trustees agree with us when we go over the facts with them, but when it comes time for action they go back to bitterness."

Speaker Matt Pavesi said new Chair of the Board of Trustees Dan Taylor may be supportive of the LSC.

"Taylor can either leave the trustee meeting a champ, or he can upset a lot of people," Pavesi said.

Pavesi also announced he will run for a seat on the Amherst Select Board. If he is elected, Pavesi said he will use his three-year term to represent student concerns.

"We have never had a student member of the town Select Board before, and that is why student issues are not brought up," Pavesi said. "I am not anti-town, I am willing to work with the town. Realisticaly, I need 1,500 votes to win, which is not very many, but the most students to ever vote in a town election is 100."

Pavesi, whose job as SGA speaker ends on April 1, said the election for Select Board will be April 5.

Pavesi, 21, is a senior and Precinct 4 town meeting member.

Clinton sends health plan into Congress

By KAREN BALL
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Promising a "new era of security for every American," President Clinton hand carried his revised health care plan to Congress on Wednesday and urged passage within a year.

Clinton won't "get the full bite of the apple," said House Republican Leader Bob Michel. He added that there are "substantive and profound policy differences" over many element in the plan assembled by First Lady Hillary Clinton.

"Oh, it's so complex and convoluted, we'll probably go through it section by section and change it," said Democrat Pete Stark, a House Ways and Means subcommittee chairman.

Clinton presented the plan in the Capitol's ornate Statuary Hall.

Delivery of the 1,300 page plan reignited the debate over Clinton's approach. It sparked little fire fights Wednesday in a preview of the big battles to come between the president's hard core supporters and foes on Capitol Hill.

It could be August 1994 or later before Congress acts.

"Circus fanfare" was how House Minority Whip Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., described the president's ceremony.

According to a White House list, 29 senators and 43 House members are cosponsoring the president's plan. The list includes critics who plan on making big changes, such as Stark and fellow California Democrat Henry Waxman, chariman of a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee.

"It's a little bit more expensive and a little more government than the American people can get excited about," said Rep. Charles Stenholm,

Minuteman sentiments voiced

Student Union rally draws discontent, disinterest

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

It seems as though rally season isn't over. Despite the raw weather yesterday, about 70 students gathered on the Student Union steps yesterday for the University of Massachusetts Republican Club's rally to support the Minuteman.

"We are here to defend the mascot," said Greg Zenon, president of the Republican Club, in his opening statement.

Michael Morrissey, a founding member of the University of Massachusetts Alumni and Students to Save the Minuteman, said the group was started "to combat a couple of rabble-rousers." He went on to say that the issue concerning the mascot, who stood for freedom, was ridiculous.

Dan Flynn, a sophomore political science major, called Martin Jones a "Pied Piper of every fool on this campus," while pointing out Crispus Attucks and other freedom fighters were present during the Revolutionary War. He went on to say that America has a proud history and there are people who are not going to turn their backs on it.

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Republican Club President Greg Zenon, a junior English/journalism/political science major, addresses onlookers at the pro-Minuteman rally.

"In the seven years Martin Jones has been a student at this school he hasn't learned much," Flynn said.

After Flynn, Zenon returned to the podium and brought up the issue of quotas in the University's enrollment practice. He said a goal of 20 percent minority enrollment on the Amherst campus cannot be reached.

He said the percentage of minority students here is 12 percent, and the population of Massachusetts is 5 percent. Zenon accused the administration of turning in-state residents away to bring in out-of-state minorities to fill quotas.

UMass officials disputed Zenon's statements. The University is a Land Grant Institution, and part of its mission is to represent everyone in the Commonwealth. The admissions office has a goal to recruit 20 percent of incoming freshman classes as people of color to represent the changing face of the state.

Zenon focused his speech on Chancellor David K. Scott. He said because of the fact Scott legitimized the protestors, UMass is being laughed at throughout the country.

"It's all over for you and the Minuteman wins, UMass wins," said Zenon after he offered the microphone to the counter-protestors.

With an open microphone left to the crowd, many people took the advantage to share their opinion about the mascot controversy.

"All I wanna say is — who cares?" Cherie Willoughby, a junior political science major, pointing out there is much more to worry about than a mascot.

Brian Conley, a sophomore social thought and political economy (STPEC) major, got into a debate with Flynn after he was called a communist for saying that all students have right now is their sheer numbers. He said the Minuteman should mean something for everyone.

After the rally, Flynn said he felt it worked really well and even though the weather was terrible, the

Cancer research underfunded

By PAUL REGER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Almost half a million American women will die of breast cancer in this decade while research projects that offer hope of better treatment are delayed for a lack of money, a presidential commission says.

The Special Commission on Breast Cancer said Wednesday that federal agencies need to spend at least $500 million a year to make substantial progress against a killer disease claiming more and more victims.

The National Institute of Health now spends $300 million on breast cancer research, commission chairwoman Nancy Drinker said. The Defense Department has another $210 million for research over five years.

"There are two things we don't know about breast cancer," Drinker said. "We don't know the cause, and we don't know the cure. Until we make such a commitment, we're not going to throw either one."

Breast cancer will be diagnosed in about two million women in the 1990s, the commission said, and 460,000 will die. Since 1950, the incidence of breast cancer has increased 53 percent — one of the fastest growing killer diseases in the nation, said Drinker.

Drinker said many promising research opportunities are being ignored and underfunded because the federal government is not spending enough on breast cancer research.

Drinker said that in 15 months of research and hearings, the commission found that lack of funds is slowing the battle, despite promising advances in genetics, molecular biology and other fields.

"We need to get an army of young scientists into the pipeline to research new and novel ideas for treatment of breast cancer," she said.

Fun n' gun

The long awaited poll is out and we can all thank the Insider's Edge, a college guide book, for ranking 300 universities and colleges in order of "funness."

Topping the list is Florida State University, who also has the nation's top ranked football team. Massachusetts checks in respectively at No. 16. In accepting the title, the news editor at FSU's student newspaper attacked the poll.

"The whole survey is flawed," said a ungrateful Raju Cheblum. "I'd rather be No. 1 in academics."

Fat chance of that happening Raju, please accept your honor with dignity next time, it is a true honor. Here is a look at the Top 20:

1. Florida State; 2. California-Santa Barbara; 3. Vermont; 4. Rice; 5. Syracuse; 6. Georgetown; 7. Alabama; 8. Penn State; 9. Connecticut; 10. Tulane; 11. Nevada-Las Vegas; 12. Southern California; 13. UCLA; 14. Miami; 15. Arizona State; 16. Massachusetts; 17. Cal-State Chico; 18. Colorado; 19. Illinois; 20. Oklahoma.

And the bottom five:

296. U.S. Naval Academy; 297. John Hopkins; 298. Rochester Institute; 299. West Point; 300. Chicago.

The survey considered a combination of things, including, parties, illicit drug use, casual sex, big time athletics, location, ease of graduation and the number of beautiful women roaming campus. Which, of course, are all fun things.

For the rest of you five college students, Amherst ranked No. 237, while Smith College (No. 249) edged out Mt. Holyoke (No. 250) by the hair of an unshaven leg.

But cheer up, even if your school has no social life and you are paying tuition through the nose, Hampshire didn't even make the list. Which is pretty sorry considering renowned party schools, such as Sweet Briar (192), Colorado School of the Mines (199), Goucher College (252) and the University of the Redlands (263) all made the list.

So UMass banged in at 16th, which, to me, seems a little high, but not nearly as outrageous as UConn (No. 9). Anyone who has ever been to Storrs, Conn., or in either of the town's two bars, will realize that this school has no business being ranked above No. 11 Nevada-Las Vegas, or even Alma College (No. 74), which is a perfect place to have as your alma mater.

However, the Huskies are defending their turf, which no one would want anyway.

"Because there is nothing else around, this campus is fun," UConn freshman Mark Laliberte pointed out to me yesterday. "There is always a party going on, there is a very social atmosphere here."

Senior Dave Pape concurs: "I'm still recovering from a party here last year. Miller Genuine Draft pulled up to a parking lot with 50 kegs and 5,000-6,000 kids drank for free."

Sounds like a good time, but any school with Jim Calhoun coaching the basketball team is automatically disqualified from the Top 20. We know his team won't be ranked there.

How about UVM, chalking up a No. 3 ranking on the shores of Lake Champlain? The Catamounts may deserve it, for three reasons. One, from all accounts, no one studies at UVM; two, the Downtown bar scene is unmatched; and three, all the kids are loaded (with money and booze).

"It is the most expensive state school in the country and a lot kids have a lot of money, so that helps (the parties)," said Laura Bernardini, who edits the school newspaper. "We've had a lot of problems up here with alcohol abuse and alcohol related deaths."

Bernardini says most students are used to being near the top of such lists. She says being so close (two hours) to Montreal, the fact everyone skis and the plethora of marijuana helps UVM's ranking (and students) remain high.

Finally, how sad is the party scene at the University of Chicago, which is deemed less fun than West Point? At West Point you are not allowed to leave campus, there is constant hazing, the academics are brutal and you have to do a 1,000 or so push ups before breakfast. A great training ground? Yes. Fun? No.

So what are they doing at Chicago for a good time? Nothing, I guess.

Task forces coming under fire

Faculty upset at Hispanic, Latino underrepresentation

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The recently appointed system-wide University of Massachusetts task forces designed to restructure the University do not have enough minority and female representation, faculty members from various UMass campuses have said.

In response, Executive Vice President of the University System Allen Sessoms has asked the chairs of the six committees to add more minority and female faculty, students and staff to each of the six committees. There are now 13 to 14 members on each task force.

The committees, which include members from all five campuses, were appointed by the President's office to help determine how the Mission Enhancement Funds will be spent and to assist in the general planning of the five college system. The task forces include: economic development, research, diversity and pluralism, teaching and learning, public service and faculty role and rewards.

Spanish and Portuguese Professor Jose Ornelas, a representative of the Hispanic Faculty and Professional Staff Association, complained to President Michael K. Hooker that there was only one Hispanic or Latino representative on the task forces.

"We [Hispanics and Latinos] should be taken into consideration because the task forces should be a reflection of the campus and the state as a whole," Ornelas said. "The Hispanic population is the largest minority in the state and the second-largest minority in the country. By the year 2050, one of every four Americans will be Hispanic or Latino."

President Hooker's Spokesperson Bill Wright said Ornelas has suggested a number of potential faculty and staff to Hooker who could be added to the task forces. UMass-Dartmouth Chancellor Peter Cressy has also come up with a list of potential names to expand the committees.

"There is no absolute number of people who will be added to each committee," Wright said. "But the additions to the committee will be done as soon as possible."

Professor Ornelas said President Hooker should have taken steps to ensure that minorities and women were aptly represented in the first place.

"We [the HPFSA] met with President Hooker at a conference in Springfield and he stated his commitment toward multiculturalism," Ornelas said. "He should have done the right thing in the first place, not reacting to the pressure he is facing right now."

Gallantry not lost on students

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

"The stuff that heroes are made of" is how administrators described three University of Massachusetts students who rescued two fellow students from a fire last fall.

An awards luncheon yesterday honored Jason Alie, Joseph Roman and Michael Walsh for their heroic measures which saved the lives of two individuals in Coolidge Residence hall.

"In my professional judgment they deserved this honor. They risked their lives to save two other students."
– Keith Hoyle
Director of Environmental Health and Safety

"In my professional judgment they deserved this honor," said Keith Hoyle, director of Environmental Health and Safety for UMass. "They risked their lives to save two other students."

Hoyle, who is also deputy chief of the Amherst Fire Department, kiddingly offered Alie a job rescuing people from fires.

"Next time I'm calling you and leaving," Alie said.

The fire occurred on the morning of Nov. 21, 1992, reportedly, in the room of Steven Mollineaux and Greg Silveira.

Alie and Walsh, who are roommates said they woke up to the smoke alarm sounding in the next room. Because the sound did not stop, they investigated.

"We knew there was a problem, but we didn't know what the noise was from," Alie said.

They said they knocked on the door, but no one answered. They went and got the Resident Assistant, Joseph Roman.

Roman said he had to go downstairs to the cluster office to get the master key so he could open the door.

"When I got the door open, there was so much smoke that I couldn't see my hand in front of my face," Roman said.

Alie crawled into the room and pulled one person out, sources said, then went back in to get the roommate.

According to Fire Marshall Larry Davis, if Alie had not pulled Mollineaux and Silveira out of the room, they would not be alive today.

"These three students exemplified a team effort at its best," said Housing Services Director Chika Nnamani. "They went the extra mile to enforce the principles of the community."

Hoyle said the individuals in the room would have succumbed to smoke inhalation if they had not been rescued.

Vice Chancellor Thomas Robinson also attended the award luncheon and said he is very proud to have these students at the University.

"Volunteerism and service to others is part of the college experience," Robinson said. "Saving lives is a prime example of this and speaks well for all students and the University."

Native American to speak on views

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN

"Toward an Indigenous Perspective in Feminism" will be the topic of Annette Jaimes for the third part of the ALANA Lecture Series, in room 120 of the School of Business Administration on Thursday at 7:30 p.m.

Jaimes, an enrolled Juaneno from the San Juan Capistrano, California area, was born and raised in Arizona. She is an unenrolled Yaqui/Opata with an ancestry in Mexico.

What brought Jaimes into the spotlight was her book entitled "The State of the American Mind," said Professor Anne Ferguson of the Women's Studies Department. Ferguson said an essay pertaining to the relation between Native American women and mainstream feminism really caught her eye.

According to Ferguson, the Women's Studies Department originally approached Jaimes when it was trying to open a position for a Native American. Even though Jaimes was not interested in the position, she was very open to visit the campus and speak.

Ferguson said Jaimes has an influential style of putting Native American history in perspective, by showing the depth of genocide and how the Native American is fighting back.

"She has a whole lot of knowledge of a population that tends to get neglected," Ferguson said, pointing out how when an American thinks of racism and multiculturalism, they tend to forget the Native American.

Haiti demands immediate action

Everyone must make a stand during their lifetime. They must decide where to draw the line. In certain instances, that decision can create great difficulties or even cost you your life. Nevertheless, it is inescapable if you have principles and believe in something.

Since the military coup that ousted Jean Berthrand Aristide on Sept. 30, 1991, 7,000 Haitians have been killed. Every day, innocent people are being tortured, raped and murdered because they believe in democracy and decided to vote for it. Every day, headless bodies showing signs of torture are dumped by the military in the neighborhoods throughout Haiti in an attempt to scare the people.

President Clinton has promised to restore democracy. He has given Haitians hope. But how long should the fathers wait while the headless bodies of their sons, and the raped and lifeless bodies of their daughters and wives are dumped in the streets? How long should they wait while they are forced to watched their loved ones being tortured, killed and raped? How long should Haitians who live in the United States wait in dread for the news that a family member has disappeared or been murdered? How long should we wait while our names are being placed on Death Squad lists? Throughout the United States, Haitians are being murdered because they have decided to speak out against the coup leaders in Haiti. A few days ago, a journalist who spoke against them was murdered in Miami.

President Clinton said he has asked the military in Haiti to protect the people. How foolish can he be? It is like tying a mouse to a pole and asking a cat to protect it.

Clinton must treat the coup leaders for what they are — criminals. If he is afraid to put his soldiers lives in danger for the sake of democracy, if he is afraid to face an ill-equipped and ill-trained military whose only purpose is to kill and torture innocent, unarmed civilians, then there are some of us in this country who are able and willing to fight and give our lives to restore democracy in Haiti. All he has to do is tell us where and when to go for training.

He has no excuses. He has at his disposal more than 30,000 Haitians and Haitian-Americans who are ready to go and fight for their country. All we ask for is the weapons, three weeks of training and transportation to Haiti.

We ask Mr. Clinton to stop negotiating with criminals in Haiti. They should be given an ultimatum to leave the country. I ask you who are reading to take a stand with me, and support democracy in Haiti. I ask you who believe that people have the right to live free, the right to say no, the right to eat at least one meal per day, the right to your own opinion, to pressure President Clinton to act swiftly against the murders in Haiti. Everyday they spend in the country poses a threat to the lives of Haitians in both Haiti and this country.

There will be a rally held on the Student Union steps today at 12:30 p.m.

Demystifying AIDS

You're sitting in the Mullins Center, with the crowd anticipating the evening's basketball game. Look at all the people. Now, stop time and look again. How many of the people in that arena have contracted HIV and don't know it? How many will contract the virus and spread it with out knowing it?

And now ask yourself, how many people will it take to die and suffer painful deaths before we start to take some responsibility for ourselves and our actions?

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

Everyone that is sexually active should take the HIV Antibody Test. There is no specific AIDS test, rather what is known as the AIDS test is really a test for antibodies to the virus that causes AIDS. The immune system reacts to HIV infection by producing antibodies that fight HIV. The test detects these antibodies.

Getting tested is the first step. However, one should realize a few things before actually going in for the test. If you decide to get tested, do so only at a center that offers pre- and post-test counseling.

Also, it is to your absolute benefit to have the test done anonymously. Do not give your name, social security number, or any other identifying information because it may come back to haunt you later.

An anonymous test allows you to control the results. This guarantees you strict confidentiality. You are given a number at the test and you must present that number for the test results. You will be the only one to know of your results. The only other individuals that will know your test results will be the people you decide to tell.

The opposite of the anonymous test is the confidential test. The test results are protected like the rest of your medical record. However, your results could be passed on by permission or by accident to someone with access to your records.

Leaked information may lead to your being discriminated by places of employment, insurance companies, and any other facet that discrimination could fall upon. Before you get tested find out the policies of the center where the test is conducted.

The UMass Health Services (549-2671 X126), Family Planning Clinic in Northampton (586-2539) and Holyoke (536-8777), as well as the American Red Cross in Springfield walk-in clinics offer free, anonymous/or confidential testing.

A "negative" test result indicates the absence of HIV antibodies at the test time. On the other hand, this means one of two things: you do not have HIV infection or you do have HIV infection but have not yet developed antibodies. A negative test result doesn't guarantee a clean bill of health and should not be used as a substitute for safer sex.

A "positive" test result is not a diagnosis for AIDS. Rather, it indicates that you have HIV and can spread it. Some people have symptoms others do not.

HIV antibody testing may have negative social and psychological consequences. Be aware of state laws regarding reporting of positive test results. Never use blood donation as a way to be tested.

HIV does not discriminate. This virus knows no boundaries and everyone is susceptible. It's what you do, not who you are. Behaviors, not groups, transmit HIV.

Go back to Mullins. The clock has resumed ticking and the game is about to begin. Just remember the ball is in your court.

'Crack down' policy is extreme

I am becoming concerned about the recent "crackdown" on off-campus social life by the Town of Amherst. Beginning with the keg licensing law, this policy of harassment has intensified this fall into an all-out war on parties.

Undercover police surveillance is everywhere, large fines are meted out without prior warning. People's guests are sent home without any complaints having been filed by neighbors. It has gone to such an extreme that the police even broke up the traditional Full Moon Drum Circle at Wildwood Field — a quasi-religious event involving no alcohol at all. Any social gathering is fair game.

It seems that certain members of the Select Board are so caught up in using the government to impose their own moral prudery on others that they can't see the folly of their actions. Treating people with contempt, and teaching them to see the police as their enemy, shows a lack of intelligence. After turning up the fire under the pressure cooker all semester, what is going to happen when there's a UMass/Amherst snowball fight or other serious situation involving a large crowd that really does need to be broken up?

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Since the Ed/Op Goddess has designated this space for me this week, i'd like to thank all of my fans for their kind support. Enough said.

This past week has been a confusing one in the world of the Basement. Just in case you didn't know, the building west of the Campus Center is the William D. Mullins Center. And if you haven't guessed by now, i have a problem with our arena.

Let's clear one thing up: Mullins belongs to the students. We pay for it. If Ogden Entertainment Services, the group which runs the house of cards, doesn't turn out a profit, they don't have to absorb the loss. Who does, you ask? The University, that's who.

But it seems to me that the higher-ups at Mullins do not realize this: the best way for students to find out about events is, believe it or not, through these pages. Mariah Carey is playing on Friday night at 7 p.m. Did you know that? Well, if you read the Arts and Living section in this paper daily, you would have known she was going to be here as of last Friday. After the story ran, the confusion began.

Since Midnight Madness is this Friday, with doors opening at 10:30 p.m., many people have been wondering how Mariah can set up, sing and leave along with her fans in attendance without interfering with Coach John Calipari, the 10,000 fans of the Minutemen and ESPN? I ask you the same question.

Many do not realize the importance of ESPN being in Mullins on Friday night, and I am not going to preach for the Men's Basketball Team. ESPN usually takes some nine hours to set up before a normal broadcast. Hmmm, if Mariah is "dress rehearsing" until 9ish, that only leaves a one-and-a-half hour window to set up. You do the math. I don't think Mullins is being too considerate regarding ESPN and the publicity it gives our University.

Arthur
STAPLETON JR.

Maybe we can all watch the Madness on WWLP-22 Springfield next year if ESPN decides this year was too hectic.

• The last time I checked the Resident Assistant handbook, public relations for the Mullins Center was not an RA requirement. The nerve of Mullins to not only put notices in mailboxes of RAs, asking them to inform their floors about the botched ticket distribution for Mariah's rehearsal, but to charge $10.50 a pop for a practice concert?

This whole thing has been made into a fiasco by a blatant disregard for the students on this campus. It was more secretive than the formula for the atom bomb — and very similar i might add. if you talked to the right people, you found out what was going on; the only problem was that if you told anyone what you knew you could get in deep trouble.

One final note on this whole incident: it is not like the Dead, Led Zeppelin or Jimmy Buffett are playing in Mullins. It's Mariah Carey.

• I don't know about you, but I think the Republican Club's rally yesterday came about a week too late. Talk about bad timing. I guess the Club took a page out of the book of our former President George Bush. They realized something was worth debating, then tried to act after the fact. Sorry guys, but there is no free pizza.

Of course, if you speak of the Republicans, it wouldn't be fair to leave out the Dems. I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw the most absurd bumper sticker in the parking lot of the Hampshire Mall: "Re-elect Clinton and Gore in '96." What planet are you on? Some people jump on the bandwagon a little too soon.

• Starting Sept. 1 . . . wait a minute, make that Oct. 1 . . . no, better make that Nov. 1. It took Chancellor Scott three months to decide on this issue but only one week to open and close, then re-open debate on the Minuteman logo. Maybe he'll meet me for a drag on the Concourse come Monday afternoon.

The sober idiot who fell down the stairs — at a party

I fell down the stairs.

I remember the whole fall, so I can honestly say I was not intoxicated. I had a few, but not a few too many. Besides, we all have fallen down the stairs once or twice in our lives. So what if I did it at a party?

I fell down the stairs at a party.

While I was on the stairs I saw a kid I had seen many times already that night. It seemed like everywhere I went during the party, I bumped into him. Then I, with a mug of beer in my hand, laughed as I saw him for the thousandth time, and joked about it to him.

I fell down the stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand.

I was walking down the stairs correctly, one foot after the other. Next thing I know, I am bouncing off the staircase on my butt, and on the last step, my mug of beer flew out of my hand and crashed to the floor.

I fell down the stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand, and broke the mug in the process.

So there I am, flat on my butt. Sitting on the muddy floor with my mug of beer wasted away (which, at this point, is irrelevant to my situation). Just my luck, the keg was in the basement, and a few people were getting a cup of beer. Plus, there were those who were watching my fall from the top of the stairs, also.

I fell down the stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand in front of a bunch of people, and broke the mug in the process.

Andrew
BRYCE

Only on the floor for a brief second, I jumped up and tried to act as cool as possible about what had just happened. Amidst the people laughing, I then began to acknowledge the crowd that had witnessed this, counting the number of steps I had fallen down and, realizing I had no more comedic material about my fall, tried to act as if nothing happened.

I fell down the stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand in front of a bunch of people and, before trying to act cool about my fall, broke the mug in the process.

After the fall, and the mug shattering, and the stand-up comedy routine, I then realized that the pinky finger on my left hand was hurting.

I fell down the stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand in front of a bunch of people and, before trying to act cool about my fall, broke the mug and hurt my finger in the process.

I must say, without attempting to make excuses (alright, I'll make just one), it was a rainy night. The stairs were covered with mud from people who had walked up and down them. Needless to say, those stairs were slippery.

I fell down the slippery stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand in front of a bunch of people and, before trying to act cool about my fall, broke the mug and hurt my finger in the process.

Obviously not the smoothest thing I have done. If someone else fell down the stairs like I did, I probably would have laughed hysterically at the hideous sight and hacked on the idiot myself. I subjected myself to the relentless hack session by those who witnessed it. And hey, I was not drunk.

I, without being fuily intoxicated, fell down the slippery stairs at a party with a mug of beer in my hand in front of a bunch of people, and before trying to act cool about my fall, broke the mug and hurt my finger in the process.

Damn, was that despicable.

Do we really know what's going on?

I've been thinking about the news lately. Now, I'm 20-years-old and quite honestly, I don't have much of a clue about what's really happening. I go to my classes, work at my job, live my life and live in near-complete (though not quite blissful) ignorance of the world around me.

I used to think that I knew everything that was going on in the world around me. At the age of 15, I had a better grasp on what was happening where, if not why, than anybody else in all my classes. I read the local papers daily and tuned in to the news every night at 11. I was the only person in my high school who knew what The Nation was, never mind read it. I liked to think of myself as a well-informed little citizen. How did this change come about and why? It has a lot to do with the media itself.

I think the major blow came during the Gulf War. I remember watching NBC at 3 a.m. when the air war started, hoping to keep abreast of what was happening. I watched the next night and the next. After a while, I started to notice something. The coverage wasn't really changing that much from day to day, just more and more of the same thing — coalition forces led by the United States bombed this, blew up that and "neutralized" another strategic target. The networks had, in effect, turned war into a mass spectator sport, something to rally behind and root for the home team.

The end of the war brought this point further home. I live fairly close to one of the air bases that was an important staging area. When the troops came home, there was a pretty big welcome for them. It got coverage. Lots and lots of coverage. More, in fact, than almost anything else going on at the time. This brought on my second realization: most of the news isn't new, or particularly important.

I'm not saying that nothing is important, but watch a local 11 o'clock broadcast, (which is all that most college students have time for) and see what they cover. There's roughly five to 10 minutes of international and national news, most of which consists of 30-second sound bites and a brief rundown of events, with little or no interpretation. After this, it's on to a few minutes of local news (not to disparage the importance of local events), and finally sports. Most smaller papers are just as bad. We're overrun with fluff.

Another larger problem with the media is one most people may not realize. The vast majority of outlets, be they print, radio or television, are either owned or controlled by a handful of companies. This means a disproportionately minute number of people in charge of said companies have a huge influence over what we know about the world. If you don't see how this is a problem, follow along:

NBC is owned by General Electric. General Electric also owns General Dynamics, which among other things, makes military aircraft and has a hand in nuclear power plants. If there's a problem with something (say a minor "incident" at one of their plants) that would be harmful to the parent company if it received too much publicity, it simply won't receive too much publicity. Of course, ABC or CBS could cover it, but as it happens, they both are owned by other conglomerates, with overall interests very similar to GE's. Get it? In one way or another, most if not all information sources have certain things they will not cover, or if they do, will distort.

We, the public, are left with few options. We could not care and not pretend to care, and revel in ignorance. We could read and watch, and believe everything we're told and nothing else. Or lastly, we can try to take in as much as we can, look at as many sides of everything as possible and still not really know what's going on.

So you think I don't drive very well

Right after my seventeenth birthday, I was fortunate enough to receive an automobile of my very own. My parents had decided I was old enough to handle the responsibility of a car, so on that fateful day I inherited a gleaming silver Volvo, which had been my mother's car for several years.

Stephanie
EISENBERG

I must confess that while I was grateful to have my own car, I was not thrilled with the prospect of driving a Volvo. Afterall, the Volvo connotes safe, careful and boring — not quite the image I was looking to project. Nevertheless, we were stuck with each other, for better or for worse.

One fated day in August, the escapades with the Volvo began. Somewhere in the middle of this day, my car gained a name, hence Elmo was born. Elmo was now my automobile, and armed with this driving machine I took to the roads.

Now as we all know, there are some people who are born to drive, and some who are just not mechanically inclined enough to operate an automobile. I happen to fall in the latter category. i love to drive but, unfortunately my driving skills leave much to be desired. I don't think I'm a bad driver (although many will protest that!), I just don't always pay attention. Because of this I have more driving horror stories than almost anyone I know.

Actually, I feel that all of these incidents have helped to make me a better driver, as I am one of the few people I know that is used to screams from the back seat. At first I was mildly concerned, now i just tend to turn the radio up a little higher. About three weeks ago, on route to New York, my conversation was interrupted with a ear piercing cry of "WHICH LANE ARE YOU IN?"

Unfortunately, her cry did not jar me to attention as she had hoped it would, rather it made me laugh, and as they soon found out, when I laugh my eyes scrunch up, and I can't see a thing. So there we are, cruising down I-91, with my eyes closed. I don't think they'll ever drive with me again. I found the incident rather funny.

Other driving incidents have ranged from getting my sun roof stuck open in the pouring rain to accidentally backing into my garage door. There was the time when I decided to see if I could drive around my whole neighborhood in reverse, (word of advice — it's not as much fun as it's cracked up to be.) And at the grand old age of 20, I've already accumulated a speeding ticket, a zillion parking tickets, and I've been pulled over more times than I can count. (Luckily, I was able to talk my way out of all incidents but one.)

As my sisters have continued to tell me, I guess it is a good thing that I do drive Elmo, after all, Volvo's are the safest automobile around. Elmo had definitely had his share of tribulations, and all in all, he's weathered rather well. His bumpers still remain intact, even after being backed into numerous things. His boxy exterior provides all passengers with a sense of security, even after they've been horrified by one of my zany driving moves. Many have told me that if I didn't drive a Volvo, I probably wouldn't be allowed on the road.

While I know I should take driving more seriously, I don't think I'm an awful driver, I'm just easily amused. My friends have continuously laughed at me. Despite all of their teasing, I know they'd drive with me any day.

I wonder though, how come they all refused a ride, even though it was pouring outside?

Risking safety

My running sneakers were rhythmic with the soft moist earth, as I sprinted through the darkness. I tumbled, sliding across the damp grass on my back. Soon I was stumbling and staggering in the bright light cutting the blackness around me. I was at the UMass campus pond. Things spun round and round, then focused for a lock and steady view.

My friends were laughing, their self-administered toxins evident in their behavior. They looked pretty silly. They dared me and I handed them my wallet and keys. The pond looked wide but I knew I could make it all the way across.

Mike
EINHORN

I was running again and my feet ceased to hit the solid earth. Soon surface tension was breaking, and my feet were thrusting through deeper and deeper water.

I was tripped by mud, causing a loss of the control I gained by ignoring my fears and doing the undoable. I burst into a wild, uninhibited breaststroke, pulling now useless legs. Breathing became difficult as I headed further from the shore and my head sunk deeper into the water. My stroke was no longer effective.

One last robust effort was swallowed up by the surface tension I had just broken seconds before. I was looking up as thrashing panic overcame me. Subsurface. A darkness was fading on me as the credits began to roll.

I decided I didn't need to breath. I reached out a fast sweeping arm, and began to move. Another stroke and my head was above the water again. My legs scissored hard as I cranked my head up, letting out a painful water filled cough, that could be heard as far as Whitmore.

I pulled in a breath and swam, determined to reach the opposite shore — knowing I was just a second from death.

A film covered my body as I coughed a raspy cough that took months to get over. I passed by a couple who commented on how incredibly dirty I was. I had ruined my sneakers, a shirt, and a pair of shorts. Little bugs crawled out of the open ends of my clothes.

I stumbled to my cheering friends who had no idea how close I was to becoming part of the mud and silt on the bottom of the pond. No idea about the terror of looking up at water, that was striving to possess me and not let me breath.

The next day I walked around the pond looking for the help phone that might have saved my life if I had stopped thrashing.

The one by the student union was broken, leaving all who were watching helplessly. The nearest working help phone was at Memorial Hall, about a one minute run. The dead zone in this sub-zero zoo for help phones was the pond. Help which might have meant my life. We boast at least 61 help phones campus wide and we can't afford to have more than one by the pond. If it's broken, which was chronic last year, we have none.

Only about 16 of these help phones are not on the front of residence halls. This means 45 help phones simply serve as apartment buzzing systems. So what does the administration believe we need, campus safety or quick delivery on pizza?

You have the answer since 16 is hardly a number I feel comfortable with. Especially when you pair it with a backlogged escort service, brutal frigid winters, and too few police on bikes or foot. Not that I'm against the cruizers, with the jet-fighter like instrumentation, paid for by our speeding tickets. Hardly.

Just a request: Maintain the help phone by the pond. Considering the few we have, it's essential.

"Jaimes is just another voice . . . to empower people of color's ideas and perspectives," said Nelson Acosta, coordinator of the Office of Third World Affairs.

Acosta said OTWA was approached with the idea of bringing her to the campus through the lecture series. He is encouraging students to take the opportunity to hear another perspective. He asked how many times can students say they have heard something from a Native American's perspective.

Jaimes has a deep history in culturally-based education, emphasizing Native Americans. She received her Masters of Arts degree in secondary education with an emphasis in "Ethnic/Minority" history and education. Her dissertation, done at Arizona State University, was entitled "American Indian Identification/ Eligibility Policy in Federal Services Programs." Jaimes also won a Visiting Professorship at Cornell University on the subject of "American Indians, Identity, Race and Nationalism."

Her most recent distinction was a Resident Scholar's grant by the Rockefeller Foundation to the Rockefeller Bellagio Center, located in Bellagio, Italy, where she worked on a book project titled "American Indians, American Racism: Identity and Survival in the 21st Century."

Jaimes is now teaching American Indian Studies (AIS) courses for the Center for Studies of Ethnicity and Race in America (CSERA) at the University of Colorado at Boulder. There she has developed and taught such courses as "Pre-Columbian Native America, and Native American Women and Historical Literature."

Homophobia is a weighty problem

Bisexual leader expresses concerns in two speeches

"I don't want to just be accepted or tolerated, I want to live my life. If people of color, women and queers come together, we are the majority," said a Howard University Divinity School professor.

Dr. Elias Farajaje-Jones was the keynote speaker for Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Awareness Days. In addition to being a member of ACT-UP DC and Queer Nation, Farajaje-Jones founded Moving Violations, a group for bisexual men of color, and co-founded the Alliance of Multicultural Bisexuals (AMBi). He is a self-described African-American, Native American, Spanish speaking, feminist/womanist/mujerista.

About 70 people attended the speech Tuesday entitled "Bi the Way, Is Anyone Listening? Racism, Gynophobia and Heterosexism." Farajaje-Jones spoke of his concern for members of diversity groups who attempt to assimilate into society.

"We go out of our way, in strange ways, to make homophobes and erotophobes comfortable," he said.

"We should not engage in this self-censorship. The queer community must stop hiding its transexuals, bisexuals," warned Farajaje-Jones. "This homohatred makes us see each other as enemies and it's reflected in frightening ways when we are trying to create spaces," he said.

Farajaje-Jones also spoke Wednesday at noon as part of the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Studies Brown Bag series. That

Collegian garners merit award; Crimson takes home the gold

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian received the Merit Award in the 1993 College Newspaper of the Year contest held Saturday.

The Harvard Crimson received the title of College Newspaper of the Year, and Boston University's Daily Free Press shared the merit award with the Collegian.

The competition is sponsored by the New England Newspaper Association/ New England Collegiate Newspaper Association. The awards were given at the group's annual conference for campus journalists held at the Christian Science Monitor in Boston.

Collegian reporter Kristin St. John was elected president of the New England Collegiate Newspaper Association at the convention.

Six schools vied for the title of newspaper of the year in the daily category: UMass-Amherst, Harvard University, Boston University, Brown University, University of Rhode Island and the University of Connecticut at Storrs.

Judges called the Collegian's editorial and sports pages "outstanding," and complimented the paper's coverage of local stories and its use of graphics, calling the Collegian a "first-rate campus daily."

turnout was "pretty good."

"This is something that triggers emotion in people," said Flynn.

Passed out at the rally, by counter-protestors, was a quote from General George Washington about the Massachusetts Minutemen and Militia on Aug. 20, 1775.

Using part of the quote which read, "They are an exceeding dirty and nasty people," George Fitzgerald, chairperson of the Board of Governors, commented "much like the Republican club itself."

Fitzgerald said he wishes "Flynn, Zenon and Morrissey would go to class rather than waste our time on the Student Union steps."

"Questioning the Minuteman is legit, the discussion is valid," Fitzgerald said. "But, we have to recognize it is part of our history and we should respect that aspect of it."

If people think the Minuteman issue is over, think again. The W.E.B. Du Bois Petition Coalition, which has brought students together from the Anti-Racism coalition, the Forum on Developing nations and the SGA, received a letter from Bill Cosby on Monday.

In the letter, Cosby wrote he did not want to sign the petition because it "would detract from this being a student directed activity." But, he encouraged the students to keep the increase of the number of students of color high on their agenda.

Celtics star's death inspires bill

CPR legislation filed in wake of Lewis tragedy

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — The death of Boston Celtics captain Reggie Lewis while shooting baskets has prompted Rep. Frank Hynes to file a bill requiring Massachusetts high school coaches to know cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

"This will make sure that if a youngster, God forbid, falls into this situation, that the adult is skilled enough to keep them alive," said Hynes, D-Marshfield.

Lewis, 27, collapsed during a National Basketball Association playoff game in April. He was diagnosed with cardiomyopathy, but another doctor said his heart was normal. Lewis died of heart failure July 27 at the Celtics' Brandies University practice gym.

A month later, 17-year-old Patrick McQuade, a Plymouth High School three point junior, passed out during a light morning football workout.

McQuade was lucky. Teammate John LeBretton and one of the four adults on the field, head coach Kent Stevens, administered CPR until an emergency crew arrived.

After spending three weeks in the hospital, doctors implanted a plastic heart defibrillator to help keep his heartbeat even.

According to the American Heart Association, about half of the 500,000 heart related deaths in the United States each year are associated with sudden heart stoppage.

Weld plans to preserve parks

BOSTON (AP) — The Weld administration unveiled a plan Wednesday to borrow $300 million to buy wilderness land and to protect, preserve and improve parks and conservation land.

The administration said the plan is the largest bond issue proposed by a Massachusetts governor to protect undeveloped space.

The Legislature's approval is needed for it to take effect.

"This bill is intended to ensue that 100 years from now, our descendants will know the same natural beauty we are so fortunate to enjoy," Gov. William Weld said.

The plan calls for spending $140 million on conservation. That would include $50 million to a newly-created Commonwealth Land Conservaton Trust to buy land that communties and nonprofit organizations want but cannot afford.

In return, the communities and organizations would be required to contribute 10 percent of the purchase price to a loan fund and to provide a management plan.

The Metropolitan District Commission and other agencies would get $76 million of the $146 million, and $20 million would go to protect watersheds and for local conservation.

The plan also calls for spending $78 million to improve state-owned facilities and for proposed wilderness programs, and $63 million for activities that protect open land.

D-Texas, one of the conservative Democrats.

"The major players have rejected incrementalism," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., predicted that a final health care bill wouldn't much resemble any of the plans that had been proposed so far.

Clinton delivered the proposal in a showy ceremony with about 70 lawmakers standing behind him. Front and center was the only Republican who signed on, Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont.

Clinton gave a shortened, repeat performance of his speech to the nation five weeks ago when he outlined a need to reform the nation's $900 billion health care system.

The White House has retooled the plan so that it postpones the guarantee of universal coverage for a year and limits federal subsidies for medical care. Other numbers have changed, too, such as how much the White House is counting on of Medicaid savings.

lecture. "Tracegender of the Spirit: Queer Sexualities in Traditional Religious Cultures," was attended by about 30 people.

Farajaje-Jones spoke of the thirst within diversity communities for spirituality in a more inclusive environment. He spoke of the very visible role of queer people in the Orisha religion. Orisha is a collective term applied to religions rooted in the Yoruba tradition of Nigeria. Orisha is a decentralized monothesism in which the Divine takes different forms - male, female, bi-gendered and often queer.

Farajaje-Jones said he felt his current issue of urgency is the importance of visible involvement by people of color within the queer community.

"What I take with me from UMass is concern about queer students of color forced to make a choice (not an authentic choice) of having to closet themselves," Farajaje-Jones said. "Straight students of color would never be asked to choose between being Black, Latino or Pacific-Islander, etc. and being heterosexual. People being so terrorized by others that they can't live as themselves — this is no way for people to live in 1993."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do not allow irritation to color your responses at work. Find ways to stretch your money, even if you must sacrifice a little more.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A family member shares great news. The time is right for travel or an inexpensive vacation. Changes tend to work to your advantage.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Although business travel is favored, delaying with a member of the opposite sex could be difficult. Stay away form argumentative types who are determined to foist their views on you.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be on you guard. An influential person may be difficult to contact. Limit spending on business entertaining — it may not bring the results you seek.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Domestic life is somewhat unsettled now. Communication may be the missing ingredient. Couples need to recall the aspirations they had when first wed.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Standing too far apart from your friends could make you feel blue. Your willingness to confide in people makes them trust you. Cool your heels in romance. Your partner may need some time alone.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Know you limits. Speculative business ventures are best avoided. Keep your hard-earned funds in the bank.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Seize an opportunity to put across your views. A speech made before a large group will trigger an influential person's interest. Financial backing could follow.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Avoid jumping to conclusions. Visitors from abroad give you valuable insights or provide new investment opportunities. Much happiness is indicated in your love life.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Prominent people are impressed by your ability to perform when under pressure. Sign contracts and agreements. Sharpening your skills is the first step toward boosting your income.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be first. Beat the competition to the punch by immersing yourself totally in you work. If problems exist at home, ask an older family member to stand in for you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Be ready for anything. Loved ones could be unpredictable, their extra demands interfering with your business or career. Make a greater effort to collect reliable information.

"It's got some big lips and tonsils," Sea Dog said in Fagerspeak.

Upon further review the lips were small and the tonsils had been removed. The race is still wide open, although Milt Cole's neckwear at basketball media day yesterday put him well ahead of the field.

• Had the good fortune of sharing a cold, frosty one with Bobby Hurley's parents before Tuesday's Hall of Fame game in Springfield. Both Momma and Papa Hurley were a bit nervous for their little Blue Devil.

"You really see how much of a business the NBA is," Bobby Hurley Sr. said. "There was just so much more emotion in college."

The senior Hurley also touted "good friend" John Calipari's freshman center, Marcus Camby, as one of the best recruits in the country and went on to say that Bobby really would have liked to have been wearing Celtic Green the other night.

• Camby got his first feel of just how big UMass Hoops has become when he was mobbed by young autograph-seekers standing two-deep at the Celts-Kings game. He couldn't have been happy when the game went into overtime, but said he's used to the attention from his high school days.

• Who was that guy in the slice joint Friday night who latereIled the pizza to his buddy as he was being brought down from behind? It was reminiscent of Kevin Turner to Leonard Russell.

• Just ask Paula Wilkins about her game-winner against UConn. Her description will make you remember what college athletics it supposed to be about when you take away the glitz, glamour and pressure. F-U-N, fun.

• How about that Oompa band at the pep rally last Friday? I've got the bootleg if anyone's interested.

Oompa. Bet you never seen that one twice in three sentences. Oompa. It's almost as much fun to write as it is to say.

• Lammy "The Panther" Chance is the leading candidate to coach Charlotte's new football team. At least they'd understand what the heck he's saying down there.

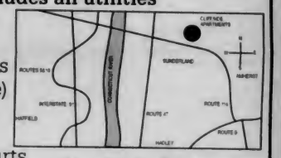
• Michelle "Beat The" Drum "Slowly" is contemplating growing her hair out just to enter the Scrunchy Queen contest. Section four, bylaw eight of the Scrunchy Queen Handbook specifically prohibits such action.

• Let me get this straight, if I protest the mascot, claim I'm on a hunger strike and act like a boob, the Chancellor will take me out for dinner? America the Beautiful.

• Oompa. Sorry, needed another fix.

• Mike Hodges would be well advised not to miss another sports luncheon. This week, Offensive Line Coach John Strollo stepped up to the microphone and not only cracked some one-liners but incorporated actual movement into the routine. His "offensive set imitation" was Chaplin-esque. The sitcom cast keeps growing.

• It would be nice if the Athletic Department showed just how big-time things are going to be around here by naming the Mullins VIP room in honor of Julius Erving.



• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on Brian Corcoran.

Men's soccer blanks Fairfield at home

STEVE PADULLA / COLLEGIAN

Freshman Joe Jacobsen and the rest of the Massachusetts men's soccer team shut out Fairfield yesterday. The Minutemen host Maine on Sunday at Garber Field in the season finale.

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team used strong defense and timely offense, rolling to a 3-0 win over Fairfield. UMass forward Randy Jacobs added to his all-time goals and points record by netting career goal number 40.

Fairfield	0
Massachusetts	3

It was an all-around defensive effort, allowing Minuteman goaltender Mark Wolf to only make seven saves for his second shutout. Fairfield goalie Tony Novello also sparkled with 17 saves.

"Novello came up with so many excellent saves, he played a great game," said Jacobs.

Jacobs opened the scoring at 15:03 of the first half by tapping in a loose ball in front of the net. Midfielder Colin Johnson fought for the loose ball on the end line and slid it to the front where Jacobs was positioned for a 1-0 lead.

With 7:51 left UMass defender Benny Sheally saved a goal by clearing a redirection by Fairfield's Jason Harman off a Stag corner kick.

"If it wasn't for their goalie, the game could have been really out of hand," said Assistant Coach Rob Donnenwirth.

The game turned a bit uglier as the Stags' Craig Catanzaro received a red card, ejection for head-butting Jacobs, who sat out the rest of the half.

The Minutemen opened the second half with an offensive flurry, but couldn't solve Novello. At 60:31 midfielder Matt Edgerly played a corner kick toward the net perfectly and forward Justin Edelman headed the ball slightly, just enough to sneak past Novello for a 2-0 UMass lead.

"We knew coming in that Fairfield built their attack from the defensive zone, and we kept them pinned down, slowing down their offense," said Donnenwirth.

The ball remained in FU territory most of the half, with Novello again stopping forwards Jacobs and Dave Siljanovski from point-blank range. At 81:24 UMass' Tomas Johansson stole the ball from FU defender Remzi Bajrami and drilled a pass to Siljanovski, who beat Novello from the center of the box to make it 3-0.

"Johansson is a senior, and we admire that he comes in strong off the bench and provides a spark," Coach Sam Koch said.

The Minutemen (8-10) have won six out of their last seven contests. UMass will miss the Atlantic Ten tournament for the first time in three years, posting a 3-4 record in A-10 games. Fairfield (4-12) has now lost seven of its last eight.

The Minutemen host Maine on Sunday at Garber Field for the last game of the year.

"I expect all of us seniors to come out with our best effort of the year in our last game," said Jacobs.

Minutemen ready for challenge

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

The New England Division I Cross Country poll has ranked the best teams in the region all season. Tomorrow afternoon in Boston, we get to see just how accurate the rankings have been.

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team will look to build upon its third place finish last week at the Atlantic 10 Championships when it takes on the likes of Boston University and Keene State.

The Minutemen finished third last season and since the race's conception in 1967 have not placed lower than sixth. UMass has won the event twice, in 1973 and 1987.

Coach Ken O'Brien said he is optimistic about his team's chances on Friday. "I think we can finish in the top three," he said.

Boston University, currently ranked No. 1 in New England, is the race favorite, but O'Brien isn't conceding anything.

"If we get off to an aggressive start and hold on, I wouldn't be surprised if we beat BU," he said.

O'Brien, who was disappointed with the mental and physical approach the team took last week, said the team is aware that they didn't run with their maximum potential.

"That's what you gain from experience," he said. "They're eager to take a second shot."

Kevin Greenhalgh, the team's top returning finisher from last year, is again expected to be among the top runners for UMass along with freshmen Jonathan Way and Matthew Behl.

"I was very impressed with how Way, Behl, and Greenhalgh raced last weekend," O'Brien said. "They made gigantic strides."

O'Brien said he also expects Ethan Nedeau and Ted Towse to again be among UMass' top group. He believes his top group is ready to run other teams' top runners.

"We may have all five guys improve their performance," he said.

Following Friday's meet, UMass will prepare for the IC4A Championships on November 13.

• I heard Coach Calipari mistook my esteemed colleague Teddy "Special K" Kottler for me last Saturday. Up until about a week ago, I had the darnedest time distinguishing Coach Cal from Rick Pitino. Must have been the shoes.

• Wouldn't it make more sense to just let Rene host the Ingoglia-Cola Gold Helmet Luncheon at his place?

• You know things are going bad for the Patriots when Bea Arthur gets a holding call negating a touchdown. What the heck's Maude doing on Parcells' offensive line?

Let Scott Missin' go into the kicker's abyss and bring in Eric Oke.

The Collegian's Guide to Arts & Entertainment in the Five College Area

A Halloween Masquerade

By BETH GOLDSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

Waiting until the last minute to find a Halloween costume? Well, here are some suggestions to help make your search a little easier.

If you are privileged enough to have a car, or know someone who does, you might want to take a ride on Rte. 9 to the Hadley Village Barn Shops where you will find Childs Toys & Hobbies on 69 Russell St. Childs is one of the few places in the area that both rents and sells costumes. After receiving numerous requests last Halloween for costume rentals, owner Bonnie Childs decided to rent costumes for the first time since she opened her store about a year ago.

"Any character you can think of, we've got it," said Childs, "from Medieval to Renaissance to Roman."

There is no doubt that Childs has variety, with costumes including Mexican banditos, cowboys, can-cans, geisha girls, the Flintstones and a purple dinosaur.

Renting costumes at Childs can cost anywhere from $15-$75, depending on how elaborate the costume is and how many accessories accompany it. Rented costumes must be returned the next day, so if you rent a costume on Friday for a Halloween party Friday night, it must be returned by Saturday morning, in time for it to be cleaned for a customer who might need it for Saturday night.

Childs even has extended the store's hours this last week before Halloween, staying open from 9 a.m.-8 p.m. during the week and over the weekend. If there is a specific costume you are looking for, call the store at 584-2604.

Another great place to look for costume ideas is Joke City in the center of Amherst on 233 North Pleasant St. Although the store does not rent costumes, manager Nina Brooks is confident that her store has everything you're looking for.

"We have the best quality stuff around and the biggest selection," said Brooks. "The store is packed."

Joke City has a particularly wide selection of masks with a range of prices from $8.98 - $24.95. To name a few, there are Bart Simpson, Hillary or Bill Clinton, George Bush, Ross Perot, Joe Camel and the Coneheads. If you prefer to don a full costume, Joke City also has complete outfits for a cat, a French maid, a devil and many more, all priced from $6.98-$24.95.

If you're having a bad hair day on Halloween, Joke City also has wigs ranging from $14.95-$21.95, and you can create your own mask with the professional makeup they sell, but the makeup is only sold in single colors, as opposed to a makeup kit with a variety of colors that most other stores have. For specific information, call the store at 549-8117.

If you're just looking for a snazzy cat nose, a set of false teeth, or the Groucho Marx glasses look, (complete with nose and moustache,) you can check out A.J. Hastings next to the Jeffrey Amherst Bookstore in the center of Amherst. The store also has a variety of masks, ranging from $8.95-$17.99, and a myriad of Halloween decorations.

Finally, if you're really desperate because you just found out that the party on Friday night offers free beer for everyone in a costume, you can run into CVS and pick up a cheesy "Jason" mask for $2.99, or a bunny costume for $1.99. CVS also sells those makeup kits with a variety of colors that Joke City doesn't have.

So, if you haven't already purchased a Halloween costume, I suggest getting a head start in order to beat the rush on Friday afternoon. Good luck and Happy Halloween.

Cooly sarcastic Dazed; cheerless Rudy

Rudy (Sean Astin, c.) wins a place alongside the gifted athletes on Notre Dame's football team in Rudy.

THE REEL WORLD
by Jon Lupo

Once upon a time in 1991, then 29-year-old writer-director Richard Linklater concocted Slacker, a free-form comedy about aimless, post-college Generation X-ers that scored as a cult fave turned indie triumph. The fun of Slacker was while at the same time it was lending a certain validity to slackers everywhere (at least pop culture-wise), it was mocking our collective self-indulgent egos.

Linklater delves into even deeper mines of comic irony in his latest effort, the cooly sarcastic Dazed and Confused, a film whose wit is so sharp it cuts right through the John Hughesian self-important angst of '80s teen flicks. Linklater transcends just capturing the '70s era (the bell bottoms! the bongs! the hair!) and creates a teen comedy wise beyond its years.

Following freshmen (when they were still called that) and seniors-to-be on the last day of school in 1976 at a Texas high school, Dazed covers the lives of a handful of teenagers from the final bell to a killer keg party that evening. Along the way, they drink, philosophize, haze the younger teens, make out (how groovy!), drive Trans-Ams with Aerosmith's "Sweet Emotion" in the 8-track and smoke an abundance of pot.

Linklater evokes not only the whole look and feel of the '70s, but also the general incidental attitude of a hazy time where kickin' back was less of an escape than a way of life.

Of course, there are pointed parallels to today, most notably when a teacher remarks, "This summer, when they're feeding you all this Bicentennial brouhaha, remember that it's all about a bunch of white, slave-owning aristocrats who didn't want to pay their taxes." Sound familiar?

The big difference, though, between us and them is that we'll never be as cool, real or original as those groovy guys in flares and Nikes or the chicks with the tight jeans and clogs (God help us if those ever come back with a vengeance). Heck, even the stoners were cooler.

The cast is for the most part unknowns, which saves us the seemingly inevitable chore of having to see Keanu Reeves do another period piece. Everyone's a standout — Adam Goldberg and Anthony Rapp as sensitive guys whose neuroses are trapped in the wrong decade; Rory (Rory?) Cochrane as the classic incoherent stoner (he's so good, either he's a superb actor or he was, well, stoned the whole time); Jason London as Pink, the stud quarterback contemplating whether to sign a drug-free pledge contract; and Matthew McConaughey as the fading graduate still trying to pick up pick up freshman babes (his hairstyle alone is so sleazy, it looks as if it was left over from a grainy '70s porn flick — not that I would know, of course).

The best of the bunch turns out to be Wiley (Wiley?) Wiggins as a junior higher trying to come of age amid the high-school hierarchy. Wiggins is Dazed's closest thing to a hero, and it's because everyone's been in his place at one time. His excellent performance doesn't hurt either.

Linklater's style is so entertaining and so dead-on — it's Fast Times At Ridgemont High by way of Robert Altman — you almost don't notice his sly jabs at the youth of today; the manner in which we act like a bunch of self-obsessed posers, wearing our media-drenched maladjustments on the sleeves of our GAP mock flannel shirts.

Dazed is, first and foremost, a funny, truthful comedy that derives its humor from the naive and intrepid awareness of teenage humanity. Its infantile pro-druggie ad campaign aside, Dazed and Confused is a (eh-hem) trip definitely worth taking. A- (Academy of Music)

Rudy — If Dazed and Confused is stuck in the '70s, the rah-rah manipulativeness of Rudy belongs strictly in the '80s. This true-life (uh-huh) underdog tale is all about a pint-size kid with an impossible dream to play football for Notre Dame. It doesn't matter to him that he's too short, underweight, has only passable athletic ability and everyone is telling him he can't do it — but he's got dreams, dammit!

As played by the blanky enthusiastic Sean Astin (Toy Soldiers) — you just want to tussle his hair and tell him to get over it — Rudy certainly has the stuff of an '80s hero legend, but there's no doubt there's some serious string-grabbing at work here.

Of course, it depends whether you like this sort of stuff and are willing to forget — despite its real-life origins — the abundance of cliches and "Afterschool Special"-esque performances.

Don't subject yourself to Rudy if you're the least bit cynical, because the movie will surely grate your senses before it will warm your heart. No points guessing what my reaction was. C (Mt. Farms)

Halloween fun with Corky & Sam

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Corky found love on Halloween; this is no small feat. Not only did he have to overcome a whole slate of things working against him, he had to conquer his own impending self-doubt. Were he really fu . . . err . . . cocked, like many of us will be on Halloween, this wouldn't have even been a problem. We've already got the advantage of everyone's favorite social lubricant working strongly in our favor.

By eliminating Corky's other setbacks, there is nothing preventing any of us from finding a true and lasting relationship on this delightfully pagan holiday.

Fans of ABC's candy-coated cheesefest "Life Goes On" already know two things.

1) Corky hooked up, miracles do happen.

2) I'm not one of you. Heck I don't even know if the show still exists.

Weighing against Corky were numerous Halloween faux pas.

•He wasn't drunk

•His moron superhero outfit sucked.

•He was too eager.

And yet somehow, Corky still managed to woo a very attractive girl. Were he truly prepared, who knows the extent to which he could have taken his popularity.

While intoxication can often help, it is the costume that is essential. I've seen many a Halloween party-goer ruin his/her chances by donning a binding costume such as a concrete podium or an amorphous blob. How're you supposed to be mobile if you're hauling 50 lbs. of cement on your torso? It's just not practical.

Eager behavior is also never a plus and on Halloween, being eager can be hazardous. There is no harm in sitting back and playing cool until that Amazon Princess or Superman saunters your way. If you slobber all over the first leather-clad biker chick you set eyes upon, those gorgeous blond locks could be a wig and those perky nipples could be Raisinettes.

Let's get back to the drinking. Last year at Hampshire College's "Trip or Treat," I happened across a keg of Samuel Adams - you heard me right. I was overcome with joy. I seated myself nearby and proceeded to guzzle. When I stood up (which as you can imagine, was quite a chore,) I became aware that with a stomach full of heavy beer, you do three things . . .

•Get fat and bloated.

•Urinate a lot.

•Fart like a banshee.

Suffice it to say, even though I sported the duds of a light and mobile glow-in-the-dark monk, the attributes brought on by Mr. Adams didn't really work in my favor. Corky laid off the juice entirely, which while sparing air pollution, could also have been detrimental. Find a happy medium.

Think man, think.

And yet despite all that was working against Corky's favor, he still found love. This is truly a reaffirming message.

Putting all the positive notions together, our luck on Halloween can outweigh that of even Corky. The perfect Halloween partying strategy can be found.

Mazzy Star shines

Album one of reflective tales & tunes

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

So Tonight That I Might See
Mazzy Star
Capitol

I was spending a little leisure time in the Haymarket Cafe in Northampton a while ago, when I heard an unfamiliar tune on the radio, and I made it a point to go to the counter and ask who the artist was.

The guy behind the counter paused from pouring a hot cup of java long enough to say, "Mazzy Star."

I thought to myself, "Mazzy Star?! What the hell kind of name is that?" Nonetheless, I ventured to the nearest music peddler and added the tape She Hangs Brightly to my collection the next day. Somewhere amid my John Mellencamp, Ice-T and Guns N' Roses, I knew it had a place; a whole new genre of imaginative sound.

Three years after that album, Hope Sandoval and the crew of Mazzy Star are back at the softly lulling melodies and haunting lyrics that make their music such a delicious retreat from all the loudness that regularly clogs the radio and blares from speakers all across campus.

So Tonight That I Might See continues the trance that Hangs began the hypnosis with, and I've just realized that Sandoval never once raises her voice on either album. Although that might seem like it would make for a pretty monotonous collection of tunes, it definitely doesn't turn out that way.

"Fade Into You" is the entry descent into this round of reflective tales. It's easy to picture her standing before a mirror in a pitch-black room with a candle in her hand as she mutters self-examining lyric after lyric.

It often sounds like Sandoval has just been roused from a deep sleep as the lyrics slur from one verse to another. I guess it's a good slur, because I admit I liked the album.

"Bells Ring" is the next song, and is carried with a similar guitar riff as the second song of the first album; the pattern of how the pieces follow one another is very much like that in Hangs, and the flow is a soothing, comfortable, almost depressing relaxation.

One song, "Blue Light" (no, it's not about K-Mart) begins with organ music one might hear at a funeral.

"There's a shadow that sails on by my window . . . I think I see it sailing away/There's a world outside my doorstep," Sandoval sings. You have slow songs, and then you have slow songs.

"Wasted" has a funky guitar/drum beat, one that might serve as background music for a striptease. It's cryptic message begins, "After I stuck my hands into your ground, and pulled out somebody else's sound/I felt a little unfortunate, a little mistaken—I felt like I've been wasted all day long."

"Into Dust" has perhaps the eeriest cadence to it. It's about two strangers meeting and turning into dust, emotionally and spiritually. Emotional and spiritual are good words to describe this album, it's sound is so relaxing it could soothe a raving lunatic with one or two songs.

The title track is more of the same; a drawling lullaby rhythm with a few deep, meaningful lyrics thrown in. It could easily be called "So Tonight That I Might Sleep."

Mazzy Star definitely hasn't thrown in the towel. So Tonight That I Might See, along with their previous album, sets a mood that is indefinably mellow and never lets up.

Even the pictures on the inside cover, albeit I can't tell what they're of, are in black and white. There isn't a single high note on the album, and yet the songs aren't simply rehashes of each other. Simply put, it's a really good album.

No glamour and glitz here, just the basics: soft, mellow and "mazzy."

Hell for the Puritans is setting for Crucible

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

The Crucible
Smith College
Oct. 22

The images of The Crucible are drawn from a Puritan Hell. Set in the climate of M.E. Kane's scenic design, in which ceiling beams tangle like strangling fingers and the shadows of bars darken the floor, Arthur Miller's tale of witch-hunts and revenge glows with the intensity of a fire.

The Crucible is set in the Salem of 1692, where a group of girls discovered in shameless and forbidden dance remove blame for their actions by claiming the influence of witchcraft. This accusation creates a flurry of local interest, and in the trusting eyes of the public the girls see themselves empowered.

For 17-year-old Abagail Williams, the swift and permanent destruction of accused "witches" makes possible her dream of reclaiming John Proctor, the married man with whom she had an abortive affair. When the lists of the accused are drawn, Proctor's wife is prominently mentioned — alongside all those to whom the accusers feel malice or ingratitude.

What follows is a farce of injustice, as accusation and retribution spiral out of control. Every breath, every movement in this play exists to complicate the next — until no one on Earth is above suspicion. A child's game in the forest leaves an entire village dead, with orphans wailing in the night and neglected livestock wandering the roads.

Battle of the bands means competition

COLLEGIAN/MATT KELLY

Warm Core Eddy, Runners-up in the Oct. 16 "Battle of the Bands."

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Guitars flying, vocal chords straining, distortion everywhere and the battle rages on. Already, a considerable number of local bands have had their turn in the spotlight of the "Western Massachusetts Battle of the Bands."

Only a couple have pulled through without casualties and many more will have to crawl back to their practice area to lick their wounds and keep practicing, but "the exposure is priceless," said John Greene, recent University of Massachusetts graduate and keyboardist for first round victors yeP!

"Battle of the Bands" is a showcase of virtually every talented local band. The only criterium for a band to compete is that they play in the local area, according to Justin Gallant, the event coordinator and UMass BDIC student.

"Sixty bands entered," said Gallant, "and 33 were selected." Preference was given to the bands with the most original material, said Gallant.

Organizers then designated five divisions of between six and eight bands and assigned them a battle and a venue to play in based loosely on their musical style. The venues range from Southwest's outdoor horseshoe to as far away as Holyoke's The Waterfront. "There isn't just one single bar involved," said Gallant. This rules out the likelihood of any homecourt advantage.

Yet one need only look as far as the cause behind the battle to see the real value of the concerts. All proceeds after expenses have been deducted will go to the River Valley AIDS Project, which provides everyday assistance and helps with the expenses of AIDS patients while promoting public awareness of the epidemic.

Angst, exploration underlie dog's promise

COURTESY MELISSA MORRIS

Mike Oram, Eric Saulnier & Denis Salnier are dog.

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

If Boston has one thing going for it musically it's the simple fact that no one can put a finger on one "sound." With bands like Buffalo Tom, The Lemonheads and O-Positive defining the Boston scene, it's good to see that the philosophy still stands. That's why I wasn't surprised to hear dog, who strive to emerge in the wake of these bands with their new release "Big Shiny Rocks."

Boston's dog provide the best of both worlds for alternative music fans who want new, interesting and provoking music, but at the same time generally enjoy enjoying what they listen to. In other words, quirky and catchy.

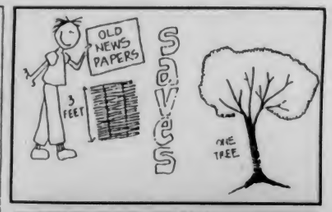
You'd think that this trait alone doesn't warrant the five bucks for their tape — and it definitely isn't the only thing this band has going for it, but upon closer examination of current indie offerings, it seems that providing engaging and inspiring tunes falls somewhere between elusive and impossible. Thank God for dog's pleasant surprise.

Dog's appeal can be traced to a number of different sources. Singer/songwriter Eric Saulnier made his mark with North Adams' Idle Mind which also included dog guitarist Mike Oram. These two teamed up again in Boston for Trenchcoat, which in turn spawned their current collaboration (in fact Trenchcoat's demo actually contains a few embryonic dog tunes and in itself is a gem if you can find it).

Eric and brother/drummer Denis Saulnier collaborated a couple of years ago in Swinging Monkey, which is also worthy of mention. Their release made waves in the Boston music scene, leaving many people anxious for a return appearance from the trio. Denis also went on to play in Connecticut's Humdlfter which further went on to spur forth members of New York's Spent and Chapel Hill's Superchunk. The point, I guess, is that "Rocks" is built on more than just three guys and some songs.

But enough about people and the webs they weave. In the end, the music's all you should care about. And the music is very good. As their press kit warns, it's "catchy as hell" but beneath that initial observation lies deeper and more subtle applications. The riffs, beats and general groove of the songs are often times slightly off kilter rhythms, but not so much as to be distracting from the overall theme of angst and exploration. Imagine a twisted Minneapolis-pop sound intermingled with hard driven guitar crunch and a hint of early '80s Rush. Sure, it looks ugly, but it sounds pretty.



Lyrically, Saulnier manages to convince you that he knows where you're coming from while simultaneously extinguishing hopes that you know where he's coming from. Translation: you understand and relate to the shape he's in, but you're not exactly sure how he got there and this is the beauty of his lyrics; not figuring it all out during the first listen. The band's release claims that the singer tries to "air his dirty, white, suburban, middle-class laundry with the earnestness of Soul Asylum and the finesse of Buffalo Tom" seems appropriate but doesn't tell the whole story. This boy has a persecution complex and wants to share some of his tales from the bottom of the pit. And coupled with Oram's stunning harmonization, his wails manage to strongly escape the abyss.

The overall mix? Sure, it's a demo, but you don't need a college degree to smell promise smeared all over this release. Dog deserves a larger audience, and they seem destined for it. Oram's guitar texture provides enough melody to keep you moving along during Eric's somewhat twisted confessions and Denis' punchy, pounding percussion. It's like singing along during a mob riot; you're not quite sure why you did it until you're doing it again, it's just plain fun.

You can hear dog being featured this week during the Jake the Squid radio show which airs Saturday nights between 12-3 a.m. on WMUA radio in Amherst. And after you've been bitten by the dog you can search for "Big Shiny Rocks" or do like I did and write to; dog, box 5808, Marlboro, MA 01752. You'll be glad you did.

ago showcased eight predominantly college bands. The stylings of local favorites yeP! best described by the term du jour, "retro-hippie," went over well with the modest crowd of students. "I was a little disappointed by the turnout, but it was OK," said Greene, who added the tight set of his band made him "happier than I've been in a while." Look for yeP! at other local venues as well as in the "Battle of the Bands" finals.

This past weekend's battle at Pearl Street produced a second winner in Borderland. The eventual winning band will receive prizes ranging from gift certificates for local businesses to studio time and cash. The whereabouts of the early December final has yet to be disclosed.

The next chapter of the Battle of the Bands will be an all ages show, Friday, Nov. 5 at the Vertex in Hadley. Tickets are $5 with doors opening at 8 p.m. Additional battles will be Nov. 13 at The Waterfront in Holyoke and Nov. 19 or 20 at a location to be announced.

◆ Crucible

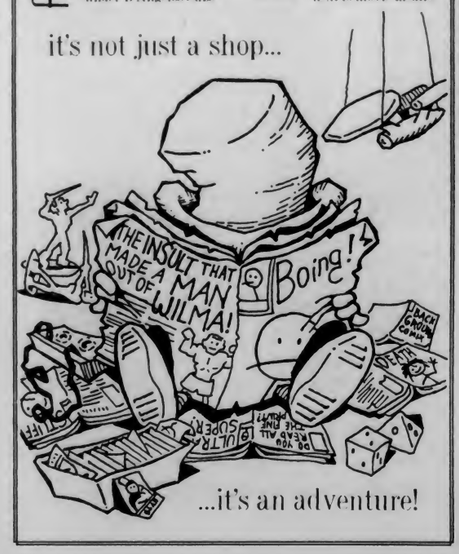
As directed by Sam Rush in the current Smith Theatre production, The Crucible is a riveting (if black-and-white) Morality Play — in which the villains have evil in their marrow and the heroes seem in imminent danger of ascending directly to heaven.

Rather than being cast as the adulterer who seduces an innocent girl and disgraces his wife, John Proctor is seen here as a man bravely fighting to correct the past and regain his honor. Actor Gene Kane plays the role with all the square-jawed earnestness of a 17th century James Stewart, and the result is an exceptionally engrossing production.

If a weakness exists, it is in the casting of Thomas Lyons, who plays the zealous Reverend Parris as if posing for a woodcut: his persistent squint and arched fingers convey broad, comic villainy, while his voice and manner convey the emotion of a log.

What compensates for this shortcoming is a delightfully over-the-top performance by Michelle C.T. Hendrick as Abigail Williams, shifting with a tilt of the head or turn of the ankle from a virginal Puritan child to a lusty siren in black. Hendrick is a hell of an actress (if you count the pun it is yours, not mine), and this role is a playground for her. Within the space of minutes one can see her blushing like an embarrassed schoolgirl, purring like a cat, or pointing angry fingers at the air. When an accusing Abigail allows her eyes to crinkle, with silent joy at the havoc she is creating, Hendrick comes dangerously close to outclassing the other actors onstage.



But this a tight ensemble, in a taut drama which rarely falters in its footing.

Remaining performances of The Crucible are Oct. 27-30 at 8:00 p.m. Phone 585-3220 for more details.

Lincoln apts. flooded by sewage leak

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

With all her furniture and belongings piled on a hill in the back yard, Thip Thiphavoing watched the sewage flood her apartment, number 1112, at Lincoln Apartments yesterday afternoon.

The entire complex's sewage system backed up because of a pipe blockage, causing a released in the pressure, according to a University offical.

"I was playing with my son Anthony," Thiphavoing said. "When I heard a rush of water, I thought it was the people upstairs running the water."

When she went into the bathroom, she said, there was a black slime coming out of the bathtub and toilet.

"I shut off the water, but it would not stop," she said. "My boyfriend, David, tried to use towels to block it, but it kept leaking out and then into the bedroom."

The four ground apartments in section 11 of the complex, overflowing with sewage, leaked into the back yard and the corridors between the apartments.

Over a period of time, grease clogs in plumbing can cause a blockage in sewage pipes, according to Pete Murphy, field manager with Housing Services.

"This has never happened before," said Jorge Gomez, manager of family housing. "I've worked with Housing Services for 10 years and have never seen anything like this."

The flooding began around 11:30 a.m., according to Neil Schaefer, a graduate philosophy student living above the flooded apartments in number 1124.

"I thought I heard rain," he said. "But it wasn't raining."

By the time Schaefer saw the sewage, he said it was running out of the back door of Apt. 1114. At the time, he observed maintenance people at the scene, but the majority of the crew did not arrive until 1 p.m., he said.

Housing Services called a plumbing company in Northampton to clear the blocked sewer pipe.

One of the flooded apartments was vacant, but the families in the other three will be relocated until the apartments can be sanitized, Gomez said.

Thiphavoing estimated half of her belongings were destroyed in the flood. The occupants of 1114 were not home and did not know about the flood. Apartment 1111 was not flooded as badly as the other three apartments.

"We will reimburse every single penny," Gomez said. "I hope people are going to send complete lists of damages."

Gomez said he will try to get the money for the HSA rally condemns American action in Haiti

By JAMIE D. BEARSE
Collegian Staff

Drawing a crowd of over 80 people, a rally on the Student Union steps was held by the Haitian Students Association and lead by director Shirly Gean Baptiste.

As Baptiste spoke, a petition was handed through the crowd, calling for the end of U.S. negotiations with the military in Haiti and encouraging an increase of political pressure.

"In two years, 7,000 people have been killed by the Haitian military," Baptiste said. "It must end, and it must end now."

Baptiste also said the United States was a silent partner in influencing the Haitian government to "stifle people to death." Baptiste was joined by Dezimae Williams of the HSA.

"Join the call to be active in insuring a quick restoration of Aristide," Williams said.

Williams is travelling to Haiti next week with a group to "bear witness" to the suffering there. She also drew a large crowd response in demanding "no support and no comfort for those who are massacring Haitians."

Magalie Lamour, another HSA member, called for "all women, everywhere" to get involved in pressuring to restore democracy to Haiti.

"As women, we must join our brothers in taking action," she said. "You don't have to be Haitian, you just have to care."

Moise Tirado, former president of the HSA, spoke last, sharing a personal story with the audience. Tirado quieted the crowd by speaking of a 30-year-old man arrested two miles down the street from his house for his Aristide vote.

"His dead body was found tortured and shot six times," Tirado said. "That man was Henri, my cousin."

"[Haitians] are being killed for what you and I take for granted in this country," Tirado said. "When the CIA calls Aristide unstable. Call them fools, and ask yourself what's going on."

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN
Moise Tirado, a senior STPEC and political science major, speaks about the conditions in Haiti on the Student Union steps yesterday.

He also said the Haitian military claims all the people, who voted for democracy, could not read and write.

"Do you have to know how to read and write to realize that you are being tortured?," asked Tirado, wearing blue and red ribbons on his lapel to symbolize the struggle for Haitian democracy. "These people voted for democracy to avoid torture."

Baptiste closed the rally by addressing the crowd again restating HSA's cause.

"We must speak for those in Haiti who cannot speak," she said. "We love Aristide, and only his return with the elimination of the army will end our struggle."

Aristide calls for complete embargo against Haiti

By LISA M. HAMM
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Haiti's ousted president, his hopes of returning to power by this weekend all but gone, called Thursday for a total trade embargo to force out the country's military leaders.

Jean Bertrand Aristide said he would not waver in his fight to restore Haiti to democracy. He reiterated that he would not return until army commander Lt. Gen. Raoul Cedras steps down, he said.

"One, he must leave," Aristide said at a news conference following a speech to the General Assembly. "Two, I must return."

Aristide, Haiti's first democratically elected president, was to return by Saturday under a U.N. brokered agreement reached in July with Cedras, leader of the bloody September 1991 coup.

The army has violently resisted the agreement, which called for the ruling military to resign. A transition government has been unable to fully take control, and violence has heightened tensions.

Conference to discuss Mexico and NAFTA

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

Recently, intense controversy has surrounded the implementation of the North American Free Trade Agreement. Until now the debate has focused on the effects regional integration will have in the United States. This weekend, the debate will benefit from the views of Mexican scholars and trade experts from New England during the conference entitled "Mexico Beyond NAFTA."

The conference will take place tomorrow at both Memorial Hall and the Campus Center. Registration begins at 8:45 a.m. in Memorial Hall. Admission to the conference is free of charge. The event's introduction will be given by Glenn Gordon, provost of the University, and Carmen Diana Deere, director of the Latin American studies program at the University of Massachusetts.

According to organizers, the conference presents interdisciplinary views of economic integration and its effect on politics, employment, culture, families, income and future ties between Mexico and the United States.

The first panel will examine the "Economic Liberalization in Mexico: Its Implications for Development." Other panels presentations include "NAFTA and Rural Transformation," "Contesting the Political Arena," "Logic of North-South Integration," and "The Mexican Political System in Transition."

Prominent experts, such as Helen Shapiro from Harvard Business School, Luis Hernandez from Mexico, Juan Carlos Aguirre from Harvard University and Eduardo Barrera from the University of Texas at El Paso, will be participating in the conference.

The Five College Latin American Studies Council and the Latin American Studies Consortium of New England, sponsors of the activity, will hold a reception at 5:00 p.m. with

Question of civil rights

Indian gender inequality discussed

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

"On the Cutting Edge" is the term Women's Studies professor Anne Ferguson used to describe Annette Jaimes, who spoke on the topic "Toward an Indigenous Perspective in Feminism" last night in the third part of the ALANA Lecture Series.

REBECCA J. PETERSON / COLLEGIAN
Annette Jaimes discusses feminism and indigenous women at the School of Management building yesterday.

Jaimes touched on such topics as patriarchal and matriarchal societies within the tribal nations, indigenous feminism, red-black Indians and the injustices done to indigenous people throughout the world.

She discussed how the patriarchal society within the indigenous nations is bringing Native Americans into the next stage. She said the contemporary issue is civil rights versus sovereignty, while pointing out that in 50 percent of Indian marriages the woman tend to lose everything, including their names off of the tribal roles.

Jaimes also focused on the present women's movement. She said it is geared toward the shrinking middle class White women, and it more locally based.

"We must first find common ground by recognizing our social and political differences," Jaimes said. "The term feminism is questioned by many third world women."

Security Council on the military government last week has nearly brought transport in Haiti to a standstill. The council also ordered that the assets of anti-democratic forces in Haiti frozen to pressure the military rulers to stop down.

The council also plans to discuss expanding sanctions to a full trade embargo, halting commercial air traffic to Haiti, and denying visas to those who obstructed Aristide's return, according to council President Ronaldo Mota Sardenberg.

"We request a total and complete blockade, which is necessary, even essential," Aristide told the 184 nation General Assembly in a 25 minute speech punctuated by applause.

During the speech, an estimated 5,000 Haitians rallied outside the United Nations to show support for Aristide.

In a news conference afterward, Aristide said the Haitain people would prefer an embargo to "death by weapons."

"If there is a total blockade, I am convinced that the military will not be able to hold out," he said.

Aristide called for an air embargo in addition to the current naval blockade, but said logistics would have to be worked out with the United Nations.

Board of Governors endorses LSC rights

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

Last week's Board of Governors meeting was full of discussion and debate on endorsing the issue of regaining Legal Services litigation rights. A formal vote by the board was suspended until last night.

This past week a copy of the bill, concerning the Legal Services issue, was provided for the governors and for students alike for review and investigation before a vote could be taken by the board.

And last night, by unanimous vote, the Board of Governors fully endorsed Senate Bill #301 for the reacquisition of litigation rights for the Legal Services Center.

The board strongly encourages all students to participate in the issue of LSC regaining litigation rights and may provide an information table on the Campus Center Concourse for students.

Also, much discussion surrounded the question of whether the Board should hire a facilities coordinator. Some governors argued it would provide excellent experience for students, while many countered that it wasn't a necessity and the board could do it themselves.

A motion was made for a committee to investigate the need for a facilities coordinator, but the issue delayed for next week's meeting.

This past week the board hired three students for coordinator positions. Brian Gavigan was hired as assistant office coordinator, Mylie Needle as vending coordinator and Andrea Verre as assistant vending coordinator.

The Board went on to question the postering policy of the Campus Center because some students complained of outside organizations, removing posters of student events.

The issue is being investigated and will be decided next week.

The BOG chair met with Campus Center authorities last week and, in the interest of students, ordered the Coffee Shop to re-open at 8 p.m. and close at 2 a.m. for those who like to study late.

Also, a motion was passed to investigate the possibility of renovating the Reading Room and adding a new table to the premises.

Those matters are under investigation and will be discussed next week.

Forum educates women on breast cancer

By MICHELLE ANDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

Today, one in eight women in the United States will get breast cancer in her lifetime, according to a study done by the American Cancer Society in 1992. In 1960 one in 14 women got breast cancer.

"The numbers about breast cancer got me interested, when it went from one in nine last year to one in eight," said Sunny Miller, who organized Wednesday's night's forum at the Campus Center on breast cancer.

One important prevention method is breast self-examination. It only takes 10 to 15 minutes a month and can be done in the privacy of your own home. This should be done on the same day every month, if possible.

Professional breast exams should be done once every three years between the ages of 20 and 40. Mammograms or X-ray examinations of the breast are used to detect breast cancer.

Doctors suggest women to have a mammogram by the age of 40 and every one or two years between the ages of 40 and 49. After age 49, Mammograms should be done every year.

Did you know that nationally, 44,500 women will die of breast cancer this year, according to an American Cancer Society study? That is one woman every 12 minutes. All women are at risk. Seventy-five percent of women with breast cancer have no family history of it.

"More women die in one year of breast cancer in the United States than the total number of Americans who died in the entire Vietnam War," Miller said.

Many organizations give free information on breast cancer and may have toll-free telephone numbers to answer questions or concerns.

Diagnosis and treatment of breast problems may involve medical history, palpation (breast examination by a doctor), ultrasound, mammography and prescription medications. Nine and a half women, treated for breast cancer, while in its developing stages, will be alive five years after treatment, according to W.R. Spence, M.D.

Massachusetts was the first state to declare breast cancer an epidemic. Breast cancer rose 26.2 percent from 1982 to 1988 in Massachusetts, according to the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. Since 1991, the Massachusetts Breast Cancer Coalition has been advocating for more federal funding for breast cancer research.

The Coalition is working toward improving access for screening, diagnosis and care to detect breast cancer.

Concert to save world's animals

MassPirg launches campaign for endangered species

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Correspondent

Tombstones lined the grass outside the Student Union yesterday as MassPirg began a new campaign to save endangered species. The activist group held a small demonstration with a table where students could sign petitions and get information on endangered species.

"We are losing one species a day," said Phedra Pazzallo, co-chair of MassPirg, and one of the representatives handing out information. The endangered species campaign ended MassPirg's campaign to stop the destruction of the world's ancient rain forests.

"One quarter of the world's species could be lost within the next 50 years," read a cardboard tombstone. The tombstones held the names of several endangered species. Animals included the African elephant, bald eagle, red wolf and the spotted owl.

MassPirg will also be holding a concert to benefit the endangered species cause. It will be held later in the year at The Hatch and will feature various local bands.

"Tickets will be sold. But anyone, who writes a letter to President Clinton in support of the protection of endangered species, will get in for free," said Pazzallo. "The concert last year was very successful. There were approximately 200 letters written that night to the Clinton administration in support of the Endangered Species Act."

The demonstration was meant to inform students about the dwindling populations of animals, many of which are native to our country.

MassPirg also gave students the chance to sign three petitions involving student right's issues, initiative and referendum reform, and the reduction of money a voter can donate to a political campaign.

"MassPirg is also involved with the rights of students and other political causes," said Pazzallo. "MassPirg is not just concerned with the environment."

Homophobia addressed in several ways

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

"Every day lesbians, gays and bisexuals are beaten, harassed and even killed by queer bashers," reads a poster announcing a self-defense training course held yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center.

Recent homophobic incidents at the University of Massachusetts, including homophobic graffiti found in Brown House and on the walls of the tunnel in Bartlett, convinced the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns to include a self-defense workshop as part of Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Awareness Days.

Bisexual, Gay, and Lesbian Awareness Days is a series of educational and cultural events celebrating gay, lesbian and bisexual communities. The workshop, entitled "Self Defense Training Against Homophobic Violence for Lesbians, Gays and Bisexuals," was presented Tuesday afternoon in the Campus Center by Janet Aalaff and Rachel Boudy of Valley Women's Martial Arts in Easthampton.

BGLAD will conclude this weekend with the performance of "Commie Lesbos from Outer Space," by New York-based artist, Anne Beigel.

Explaining how she decided on the unusual title for her performance, Beigel said, "[It is] because that is how people see me! If I'm a gay woman, then I'm treated as if I were also a com-

She also pointed out that gender politics is insubordination to all women, putting women of color low on the list, and Native American women in the "bottom of the pecking order."

During the question and answer period, Jaimes talked about the various problems Native Americans are going through right now, from being recognized by mainstream society to not even being accepted by their own.

Jaimes discussed the fact that not many nations are being recognized by the federal government or the tribal council. She said this is because of poor economic times. The federally recognized tribes do not want the government reserves to dry up.

This was brought up while she was touching on the plight of red-black Indians. Jaimes said there is a scholarship now available for those whose ancestors were slaves that ran away and married into Native American tribes during the Civil War. She said they were acknowledged and respected, but now Indians are denying them recognition.

She defines the word "indigenous" as "somebody who still has a mind to live in a relationship with the natural world — not destroy it."

Denny verdict: negating one injustice with another

Nature has a funny way of righting itself. It balances one supreme injustice for another by evening out equal, but opposing forces, so they negate each other. We don't think that it happens, but it always does.

This was reiterated again a week ago, with the acquittal of two Los Angeles rioters. In a legal system practical joke, Damian Williams and Henry Watson were cleared of virtually all the charges stemming from the Reginald Denny beating.

So one and a half years after the police officers who maimed Rodney King were found "innocent," these individuals were also let off the hook with only one felony conviction, that of simple mayhem for Williams.

It wasn't enough Williams assaulted Denny with a deadly weapon (a brick to the head), or after maiming Denny, he did a celebratory jig that would put to shame most football players' touchdown dances.

And like King, it wasn't enough that they caught every inch of the heinous episode on videotape.

After five jurors were dismissed and the jurors who stayed throughout caused a nearly daily commotion, they came back with watered-down convictions, putting the U.S. justice system to shame.

When we cannot even compel our peers to convict individuals caught red-handed in illegal activity, what kind of a nation are we living in? What kind of a country is it when a cement truck driver minding his own business gets his head caved in and is left for dead for no reason?

Michael
MORRISSEY

ACLU-lovers throughout defended the verdicts by saying the way the case was presented supported them. I say, just because the prosecution in Los Angeles screwed up the semantics of the case, there should be no reason Williams and Watson got off completely.

It sent a clear message: individually, you are not responsible for your own actions. You aren't. None of us are. Society was responsible for the hooligans' action because their verdict touched off the riot and Williams' actions.

Williams is not responsible. I am responsible for Denny's beating because I am a member of (a racist White) society. He had no choice. Individuals cannot be held responsible, only society, perceived as racist, can.

At this point, I would like to say something about how the two cases are different: King is beaten, the police get off, and there is a public outcry on this campus. King is Black. His attackers White.

Denny is beaten, his attackers get off, and there is no public outcry on this campus. Denny is White. His attackers are Black. There was not one editorial in these pages until now.

So how is UMass racist? This is a charge hurled from all angles at the collective campus. How are we racist if we organize for the Black man's plight but do not do the same for this White man's situation? That flies in the face of the perception of our campus as racist.

We should protest both situations of injustice equally and spiritedly. We should make sure this doesn't happen ever again — to neither King nor Denny.

By not doing so, UMass gave me a local look at a national situation. I've deduced this about the verdict, the legal system and our own campus: all three are pathetic.

We need society's respect

What are women all about? Are we simply bodies to look at? Bodies to sell? No, we are people although we are not treated as such.

Women are beautiful — our bodies and our mind. Women's bodies are appreciated for entertainment more often than our minds are respected. Something is very wrong with this.

Stacy
MALONE

I do not think women, who literally sell their bodies or display them for entertainment, are sluts or whores. Women should always be respected as people. If a woman chooses to sell herself because she honestly likes to and not because it's a last resort then power to her.

It bothers me. No, it pisses me off that a woman can make much, much more money with her body than her intellect. Women's bodies are used to sell cars, makeup, pornography... You name it, and they will use women's bodies to sell it. Women's bodies are sold.

In business terms women equal money, lots and lots of money. And just about everything in this society has a value assessed by money — even women.

Turn on a television. Open a magazine or a newspaper. Now count how many advertisements use women to sell the readers a product. Beauty sells and women are beautiful, so we are to sell and be sold.

I'm not saying there should be no advertising. There should be access to media. I'm also not saying women shouldn't model. They have the rights and freedoms to do everything and anything they want to do. I'm talking about a funny little thing society takes for granted, but don't grant to women — respect.

There is no denying the sex industry, and I have no problem using that term because that is exactly what it is — strong, alluring and rich. I suppose, in some perverted and twisted way, it may be smart for women to use such a lucrative business to their advantage. But why is such an industry so lucrative?

Is it because women buy into their own exploitation, that it no longer seems like exploitation? Is it because women accept they are oppressed by a male dominated society. And they figure why fight it, when you can join it and make a nice wad of cash?

I'm just not sure. I believe it is a combination of so many harsh realities in society that it backlashes against women in such a way that many of us sadly accept it and even participate in it.

If there wasn't so much discrimination against hiring women, maybe more women could have intellectual jobs, where they could use their minds. If there was a better system to help single mothers, maybe more women would have better choices than a store cashier at minimum wage or a topless dancer for big bucks.

I know there are women out there, who choose to be topless dancers and prostitutes, but we need to think of the women, forced into these jobs. Society needs to respect women, not sell them.

Campus is inaccessible

There is something different about UMASS this semester. Have you noticed? I mean, we still have delicious Bluewall cookies, residential life and the usual band of protesters and activists. Still, this semester is somehow different.

Why? Well, starting with the Campus Center, I decided to take a good, long look at the campus to figure this out. Just as I had remembered. The Hatch still smelled really good, the University Store was still way over priced and the bathrooms are still really disgusting.

Diana
D'AVANZO

Maybe it was my little pet-peeve that had changed. No, it still happened. When people post their flyers on the boards between the Campus Center and Student Union, they still cover over flyers announcing events that have not yet taken place.

So, what is so different? Well, after hours of heavy contemplation it hit me. Actually, it stung me in the eyes. It was loose dirt flying around in heavy winds — the result of mass construction taking place across campus.

Though there are several highlights to the work going on, I will only walk through the most earth shattering.

First, the University sponsored obstacle course surrounding the Campus Center must be mentioned. Isn't it great how the University decided to invest in those giant Tonka toys that serve no other purpose than to move large piles of dirt back and forth? Equally as important, is the administrations high regard for students. Think about it, not wanting us to miss out on the fun, they waited for us to get here before starting the game!

Now, not only is there the Southwest maze, but there is a Campus Center maze as well. Remember, if you have a class in Morrill, you will have to cut into your nap time on one of the Campus Center couches by at least 10 minutes. Considering you cannot use the east doors, now dubbed the "emergency exit", you will have to exit via the west doors, go around the Student Union, walk toward Morrill and bear to the right.

If you are in a particularly adventurous mood, take a right when you walk out of the Campus Center and walk over our makeshift bridge (just don't start jumping up and down on it — it doesn't look too stable.)

Of course, I must include Sylvan Hill in the great construction extravaganza. It's beautifully paved and has been made accessible. Sounds great, right? Well, maybe not.

Have you taken a good look at the road? If you examine it closely enough you will notice the scratches caused by the impact of automobiles as they coast over those two undeclared speed bumps. Uh-oh, better get Maaco. Just as an aside, I have been told that if you go down the hill fast enough, you will be air-born.

Speaking of accessibility, is any part of this campus now accessible? Is some of the student body being harmed because of UMass' desire to kick up dust during the fall semester — rather than, say, completing the work during the summer?

One last word of caution for those of you, who frequent the upper central residential area. When walking between Van Meter and Butterfield in the wee hours of the morning, be sure to carry a trusty flashlight, lest you should miss the bottomless pit in the middle of the island and make the next days headlines.

Straight White males aren't always the enemy

As a "straight White male" who believes environmental restoration needs top priority in our culture, I was disgusted by the lack of sensitivity in Jamie Bearse's article [Collegian, Oct. 26]. If there is one effective way to turn "straight White males" against the gay community, it is to constantly harp, as the LBGA does, on how we are all enemies of equality, peace, love, justice, and now, ecology.

When the average "straight White male" reads such rhetoric, given a human being's normal reaction to scathing criticism, do you think he is more likely to: a) become "enlightened," confess his status as oppressor and repent by marching in the next rally, or b) think "the left wing and the gay community are a bunch of hysterics" and shift farther toward the views of the "Minuteman" paper or Michael Morrissey? The latter, I think.

Why? Because it almost happened to me. However, I realized the gay and bisexual community constitute 10 percent of the population, and only a handful of them think quite the way "scientist" Chaia Heller does.

Unfortunately as the proverb says, "empty barrels make the most noise." Thus the other 90 percent, is likely to see that side is not the sanest, most rational.

Environmental destruction concerns every individual on this planet, and the cause for remediation needs every iota of popular support it can get. I, therefore, urge my "straight White male" compatriots not to be spooked off by extremists, who send a message saying you can only be part of the problem.

I also strongly encourage my fellows to try to find the voice of the silent majority in the gay community. I believe homophobia is a social disease. Familiarity with this section of our population is the best way to assuage such fear.

As for the extremists in the LBGA, I say you are not gay conscious and merely the strident voice of the malcontents. Don't go fancying yourselves as more evolved and sensitive than the rest of us. Sensitive individuals would not just assume that "straight White males" are so tough and pugnacious. Our feelings wouldn't be hurt by such ridiculing commentary.

Remember, "victims" may feel hurt and ostracized, yet be none the wiser following their exclusion. Before you leapt into invective, LBGA spokesfolks, you'd think about such things if you were sensitive. . .But you're not sensitive — self-centered and touchy perhaps, but not sensitive.

"The Flush" fails

Another unbelievable example of how in 1993 there are people so backward and ill-informed that the only appropriate place to air their views would be a stinky toilet. I am referring to a chronicle called "The Flush", that is posted in the stalls of Macnamara.

It reads, "For all of you people who have nothing better to do with your college education than raise a ruckus over a 'patriotic' symbol. . ."

It is interesting as well as disturbing how the plight of the Native Americans, African-Americans and other oppressed peoples were conveniently left out of analysis. Even more alarming, is how in 1993 people still buy that patriotic crap, strategic and essential to keeping others oppressed.

It ends, "If they don't like the Minuteman as a symbol of patriotism, freedom and independence, then they should leave the country, and let those who care about America live in peace." And that my peers, is the greatest irony of all. Because it is exactly those, who care about America, that cannot allow this type of narrow-mindedness to exist.

munist and an alien. I'm a threat to American society just because of who I am — and at least ... the title tells everyone this isn't a piece of doom and gloom."

This hilarious one-woman show was first produced by Wings Theatre Company in the spring of 1988. Performances began Thursday and will continue through through Saturday at 8 p.m. at Hampden Theater. Tickets are $3 for UMass students and $6 for the general public.

Begeil and and her collaborator Jerry James have been working on her shows for about 15 years. In 1987, Wings featured Beigel's complete repertoire of shows: Isadora: American Legend (1978) and Rege & Marge.

"As they go along they've gotten more and more personal ... Commie Lesbos really called for me to reach down inside myself and find things which aren't very attractive, the least of which is my one-time crush on Barbara Streisand. But there is a lot of warmth and humor and finally, a sense of triumph that we hope reaches everyone in the theater ... As long as I keep quiet, that's shame—and shame is the key that keep us all prisoners," Beigel said.

Unlike many recent "gay" plays which she felt were too exclusive and separatist, Beigel says she takes an inclusive approach to her performances.

"Commie Lesbos from Outer Space isn't for the entire family, but it isn't just for gays either," Beigel said.

Shockra brings funk to Noho

By JONATHAN RATCLIFF
Collegian Correspondent

GROOVE WITH SHOCKRA AT PEARL STREET

Shockra will bring their funky, improvisational rock to Northampton's Pearl Street with special guest, Rusted Nail, for a live show tonight.

It seems every time Shockra visits the area, they get a good write-up in one or more of the area's publications. The reason for this is simple. Shockra's mix of funk, jazz, rock, and rhythm and blues is artfully blended and played live with tremendous energy.

Shockra is the band to see in person. The songs on their album merely hint at the live versions that often extend into longer improv jams. Their type of performance and sound reminisces the early San Francisco improvisational rock, jazz, fusion, and George Clinton; (and, at times, can smell a bit Phishy.)

Shockra loses no individuality with these influences. Their grooves sound fresh and original. Their jams are not a show gimmick. They put across the feel of being truly lost in the creativity of their music. In a time when not many live rock acts extend themselves improvisationally to the limits Shockra does, their show is a great experience for those who can appreciate this.

Shockra's sound this fall will be a bit different than earlier shows in their career, and the sound on their CD release, "Garudas Groove" because an element of Shockra's unique sound will be missing. Jeff Grove, responsible for the throaty lead vocals and gutsy sax playing, has left the band for family ties, the birth of a daughter. Shockra's show at Pearl Street last spring was one of Groves last with the band, and after the gig Grove was asked by an admiring fan to stay with Shockra. They often mingle with the crowd after they finish. Grove stated simply, "The die has been cast."

Thus, the question arises: without Grove, how has the band been holding up? The answer is found in Shockra's full calendar of national touring dates. Shockra is tight. And talented enough to survive the loss. However, they have been putting out the word they are looking for a new lead singer and saxophone player. But finding a talent equal to Grove, will be no easy task.

Shockra will bring their "retro-hippie" style of music to Pearl Street tonight in a high-energy set of jams and grooves in support of their latest album Garuda's Groove.

Guitarist Felix Rentschler has risen to the position of filling the lead vocal gap left by Grove. Rentschler's funky guitar work combines with Edwin Hurwitz's grooving bass sound and Dan Coutou's versatile keyboard playing. Coutou uses a variety of keyboard sounds and styles, as well as sampling with sounds and voices. In the song "Dimension Extension", he uses a William S. Burroughs quote. This sampling gives Shockra's sound a modern feel, putting them a cut above your average funk band.

This is all tied together by Dave Watts' solid, jazzy drumming, which can lead to rhythmic excursions. The extreme being when the whole band plays percussion instruments.

Tickets are available for $6 in advance at the Northampton Box Office and Tix Unlimited, or for $6 at the door. The show is 18+. Positive I.D. is required. Doors open at 9 p.m.

Tommy Makem
Iron Horse
October 26, 1993

"Are you all sober," cracked Tommy Makem with his crisp Irish accent at the beginning of the show. And, was it a show. This magnificent performer masterly played his banjo, tin whistle and drum to the diverse, captivated audience.

Makem's show was a roller coaster ride of emotions. He played a range of songs, covering everything from loss and despair to dancing and drinking. The audience was sporadically brought to the brink of tears, but roared with glee within the matter of a few notes. He was well accompanied by his son, Rory, on guitar.

Makem was a true showman, playing off of the audience with his quick wit and sense of humor. A resident of New Hampshire, Makem had his fair share of pokes at ex-governor turned government "fund waster" John Sununu.

A song called "Finnegan's Wake", a tribute to James Joyce's radically unreadable book of the same title, got the audience stomping their feet and clapping their hands.

During a break, Makem talked about his long career in show business, that started in Ireland when he was working in a band. He eventually moved to New York where he became an actor, before getting "side-tracked into singin" with the Clancy Brothers. The group later toured the world, and brought Irish folk music to the masses. He left the group in 1969, but met up with Liam Clancy several years later. He recounted the incident, getting Liam Clancy and him together.

"We were booked separately to do festivals, and we got up together to sing a few songs. And, the crowd gave us a standing ovation for five minutes before we sang a note," he said.

Makem claimed that he and Clancy decided to quit while they were ahead, but went on to form the duo Makem and Clancy. They broke up in 1988, "very amicably", Makem said.

Of his involvement in the Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert with the Clancy Brothers, Makem had much to say.

"That was a very special thing [the Dylan tribute], Bob Dylan had come into. I own a place in New York called Tommy Makem's Irish Pavilion, and I was performing there one night, and he came in to caught the show himself. He stayed through the two shows that I do. And then a month or two later, this thing came up. He got in touch with me, and he invited the Clancys, as well. We decided we'll do a song together, but that was just for that night."

In response to whether or not he plans on playing again with Clancy, he firmly replied, "I've been solo too long."

I asked Tommy about why folk music was so popular. Makem asserted that his music, and folk music in general was "the music of the people, 'with a universality'."

He said folk music was something anyone can do, even "in your bathtub when you are having a shower."

Overall, Makem puts on a wonderful concert, proving to be a true showman, who could teach many of this generation's performing artists a thing or two about doing a great show.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are at the top of your form in terms of energy and charisma. Heightened confidence and a show of initiative will produce the results you seek. Share secrets with loved ones.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A conversation with a VIP will reveal vital information. Give financial worries the brush-off. The neighborhood scene offers great variety when it comes to socializing. Be friendly.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Singles will find this an especially promising day for romance. Are you really certain that marriage is what you want? Be honest with yourself. It might be best to slow things down.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Glad tidings or a visitor from afar could lead to a happy, informative reunion. Plans for a trip will jell. Look forward to launching a new project.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A change of plan could disorient you. Have faith and things will work out. Visiting a new locale boosts your spirits. The love temperature could soar tonight.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Hasty words or a resentful silence could undermine an alliance. Some quiet time alone will help you assess what is or is not working and correct it. Tell that person what you are feeling.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You and a friend or VIP are on the same wavelength now. Widening your social circle could have many benefits. You and a loved one begin to see each other in a new light.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): There is danger of taking somebody for granted today. Be extra nice to a stressed out co-worker. Talk things out with your mate. Keep an open mind.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Tradition can get in the way of change today. Postpone implementing a recently made decision. Spending time outdoors with your loved ones will bring you closer together.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Tune out worries and savor a day of fun and companionship. A movie, concert or athletic event buoys your spirits, enhancing the rapport you enjoy with a favorite friend.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A change of pace and scenery will transform your mood. Focus on spiritual growth instead of material concerns. An attractive newcomer may be looking for friendship, not romance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Your intensity beams through in a positive way today. Participating in active sports will help you release pent-up energy.

get the goal back until the 79th minute, when freshman Erin Lynch, from the center of the field, slid a pass to LeDuc, who was running down the left slot. From 15 yards out, LeDuc shot to the right of Gelfenbien.

UMass' play only strengthened after the LeDuc goal, while UConn began to lag. UMass owned the 30 minutes of overtime.

"After the LeDuc goal we had a let down," UConn Coach Len Tsantaris said. "That goal changed everything, they were playing very emotional. We didn't really connect, we missed passes and were on our heels. Overtime was very emotional for UMass. They got one early on and we tried to get things going but they were just too much for us."

The win places UMass as the top team in the North going into its final week of regular season play. The Minutewomen are now considered the favorite to host the NCAA Regioanl Tournament on Nov 11-12.

damages as soon as possible due to the urgency of the situation.

All belongings will be stored in empty apartments, but Gomez said they are not suitable living conditions because they are not clean.

The families will be relocated to North Village until each apartment can be disinfected and meets the approval of the Environmental Health and Safety office on campus.

"All facilities," director Don Robinson said, "have to meet state sanitary code."

Although Gomez said the flooding was the first of its kind he has ever seen, just last week Wysocki House, the building his office is in, flooded with sewage because of the same problem.

"It was just a coincidence," he said.
